THE ORDER AND MINISTRATION OF EVIL.

A Lecture by Mrs. Emma Hardinge, in the Cleveland Assembly Rooms, London, Sunday Evening, January 22, 1871.

The question that we propose to consider this night is one which has attracted the mind of all peoples in all ages. Like ourselves, the thoughtless minds that gaze abroad upon the marvelously strong and beautiful, the wonderful and grand phenomena of being, perceive everywhere the evidence of a wisdom so profound, a strength so vast, a design so perfect, that they can not comprehend wherefore there should be evil, darkness, wrong, suffering, sorrow, and crime. The problem of whence comes evil is no new question, then, and yet it is one that never can be solved unless we know the ultimates of life. If we once realize that this life is but a means to an end, higher, better, wiser than our present stage of existence;—if we realize that there is a result growing out of our suffering, and that our very crimes are so many indications of a possible redemption hereafter—if we realize this as perfectly as do the Spiritualists, who behold the results and fruition of life, half the problem is solved. But there is yet another portion which to the Spiritualist requires a different method of interpretation; this is, the origin of the scheme. We may, and do, realize its fruition, but it is needful for the basis of a true philosophy that we should comprehend why man suffers, wherefore he is compelled in this rudimental stage of existence to lead a life which is a continued struggle with that which we call evil. We use the word as it is popularly understood by mankind. The sophist who depends only upon the mere logic of words disputes the existence of evil at all. But we know that there are two stages of being through which we are perpetually alternating—pain and pleasure; two conditions of action between which mankind is perpetually oscillating—wrong to one another and right. There are states of vast enjoyment and corresponding conditions of pain and suffering, and it is to this antagonistic state that we still choose to apply the popular and well-understood term, evil.

We know that life originates from mind. We, who have seen mind surviving the shock, and death, and disintegrations of matter, no longer doubt, or hope, or believe, but absolutely realize that all life and being proceeds from a spiritual origin. Knowing this, we now propose to investigate, spiritually as well as practically, the origin of that marvelous scheme of which evil forms a part. We have learned one lesson by the teaching of spiritual existence, and that is, ever to look for a cause adequate to the effects we observe. What is the cause from whence a Christian world and all religious teachers trace evil? The ancient Hindoo assumed that spirit is absolutely good—that all of spiritual existence which is the origin of being, must of necessity be perfect; but, for the purposes of development and growth, fragments of spiritual existence were shot off from the being of the creator, Brahma, and precipitated into matter; that the attributes of matter were all evil, and its tendencies downward; hence the soul, by association with matter, became necessarily impregnated with evil. From this point they elaborated a view of creation in which they impersonated their ideas in the form of a trinity—Brahma, the creator; Vishnu, the preserver; and Siva, the destroyer; but these wise metaphysicians, perceiving that destruction was necessary for reproduction, that death was the necessary sequence of imperfection, and that fresh and more progressive life arose through the action of death, represented Siva, the destroyer, as also the reproducer. This was their view of evil—matter, the source, and Siva, the destroyer, the patron spirit. The ancient Parsee, the Chaldean—in fact, the entire of the Eastern nations, adopting, more or less, the astronomical religion of Sabeism, assumed that the cause of evil proceeded from malignant spirits, who divided the empire of the universe with the good. The astronomical religion divided the year into two periods—the summer and spring ruled over by good angels, the winter by malignant spirits. The sun himself was the type of all good, and the progress of the majestic luminary through the different constellations or groups of stars typified to them the perpetual conflict between good and evil principles. The Egyptians, adopting these views, also represented a tripity of principles by Osiris, the sun, or principle of good; Isis, nature, the receptive principle; and Horus the child or the product of both. Osiris, the good, was also represented as conflicting with Typhon, the bad. Typhon, the adversary, represented the signs of winter; and the alternation of the seasons between summer and winter, impersonated the struggle between the twin brothers Osiris and Typhon, represented their conceptions of evil. The Jews determined that amidst the conflicting opinions of Eastern nations safety lay in adopting them all. Hence their view of the origin of evil was a strange and fantastic mixture of Sabeism, Egyptian doctrines, and Hindoo metaphysics. From this they were occasionally redeemed by the teachings of inspired men, like Abraham, Moses and the prophets; but continually relapsing into the Sabeism of antique nations, they were perpetually found expressing themselves [illegible] different forms of the idolatry that [illegible] from sun worship.

Thus we find that the [illegible] adopted the Jewish Scriptures [illegible] the description of their furniture, [illegible]

[illegible] that our present popular theology on the subject of evil is derived. It is assumed that at a given period, say some six thousand years ago, the Creator designed this world perfect in all respects, and placed man upon it, a perfect being for the enjoyment of entire and unbroken happiness. In this condition a fallen spirit, says modern Christianity, who is the Dragon, Lucifer, or Satan, or the Devil, assuming the form of a serpent, tempted the first woman to an act of disobedience. Had man been perfect, all temptations would have been fruitless; but the temptation, it seems, came in the form of an invitation to knowledge. The wise and subtle spirit of temptation informed Eve that the act of disobedience was nought in itself, but that the results would procure that knowledge which would render man as the gods, knowing good and evil. The act of disobedience once committed, man forfeited his high estate, was driven from Paradise, and compelled to go forth with the brand of his Creator, upon him. Sin entered into the world, and by natural sequence of descent from one generation to another, gradually entailed upon posterity the curse of the first father. The result was inevitable, and we realize it in our own day. This is the origin of evil as represented to us by Christianity. It is true we are offered some redemption from this by being assured that the Majesty of the world, the Creator not only of our little planet, but of millions, and billions, and trillions of worlds, systems illimitable, left them all, and sometimes in the fullness of his godhead, and sometimes by a strange and incomprehensible partition thereof, came down to this little planet of ours, and compelling his creatures, by the act of compulsory and inherited sin, to destroy him, returned to the majesty of his godhead, and became perfectly satisfied with the scheme; and whosoever believes this history in all its parts, in all its fullness, and in all the propositions herein stated, shall be saved from the consequences of sin—though their sins be as scarlet, the act of belief shall render them white as wool. It is true that the necessity of good works to accompany this system of redemption is constantly reiterated; but we conceive that if the scheme is all-sufficient, good works are unnecessary, and if it be not sufficient, then it is of no avail at all. If good works are absolutely necessary, wherefore the necessity of a Savior to redeem us from sin? On the horns of this dilemma we are obliged to return to the proposition of brave old Martin Luther, "If you would have the substance of a Savior, you must have the substance of a sinner." So says and so acts Christianity. Heretics and so-called infidels take certain exceptions to this scheme. They claim that the original design could never have been perfect, or man would never have fallen—that if the Omniscient was wise enough to create the world, he must have been wise enough to foresee the consequences of his creation; if he were not, then we arraign the wisdom of the Creator. Moreover, they say that the historical statements are somewhat at variance with the deductions which our Christian teachers draw. The statement in the ancient Word is not that there was any spirit of evil or fallen angel involved in the act of temptation, but that a serpent tempted our first mother. We find no mention of the intervention of this malign being (who was after all the subject of and created by the Author of all good) until we arrive at the book of Job, which all scholars declare to be an interpolation upon the history of the Jews. There Satan, signifying in the Oriental language "the adversary," is represented as coming amongst the sons of God, and walking to and fro upon the earth, and only acting as a tempter by the permission of the Almighty. Furthermore, the entire of this most beautiful and instructive history depends upon the act of temptation; and if we were to assume that it was offered to man as a parable rather than to believe that some heavenly reporter was present at the majestic trial when Satan appeared amongst the sons of God and recited the same in earthly language—were we to assume that it was but an inspired and allegorical representation of the strength of man under conditions of temptation, we should realize at once the use, the ministry, and the blessing of Satan, the adversary—realize that amongst those sons or gifts of God bestowed so liberally upon us, the adversary is ever walking to and fro, and urging us, through the processes of temptation, to rise above evil.

We find only few and incidental references to the spirit of evil even in the books of the New Testament. But turning to the simple language of the Founder of Christianity, we find what word of terror means—"I have chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil." So said Jesus of Nazareth to a bad man. Were we to seek throughout all the realms of logic, and theology, and ecclesiasticism, where could we find a simpler and more comprehensive definition? In the Apocalypse we find mention of Satan, the adversary, in two places. In the 2nd verse of the 20th chapter we have the statement that Satan is the dragon, the old serpent, the devil. This dragon, the serpent, Satan, the devil, being one, how do we account for the different significations of the term, and whence do they come? We find in the ancient Sabean system that the astronomical religion recognizes the darkest and most malign of all constellations to be the Dragon of autumn, the great sign of the serpent, called also Satan, and the malignant spirit who has dragged a third of the host of heaven from their high estate; he is marshalled into the heavens by Lucifer, the son of the morning, or the morning star, once Vesper, the evening star, the beautiful, and when it appears as the morning star it becomes the sign which marshals in the large and brilliant constellation of the Dragon, called the serpent, the adversary, who, in conflict with Michael, the bright angel of that period and that portion of the skies, makes war in heaven; and it is through this conflict of the seasons, signified by the stars, that the famous history of the sun-god is told. Those who find in the Revelations of St. John a perfect description of the astronomical religion will be at no loss to account for what the origin of evil, named the serpent, the dragon, and Satan, really is. From this point we find that the early Christian fathers, who at first never taught the actual personality of a spirit of evil, gradually began to teach the belief that such a spirit did exist, and had actually warred in heaven with the principle of good. This idea never obtained full belief until the third century. Then the early Christians, who, beneath the persecutions of the Pagans, were compelled to hide their worship in caves and woods, and to perform their solemn services at night in the catacombs and sometimes on mountain-tops, were accustomed to station sentinels to guard their worship from intrusion. These sentinels, we are told, were most commonly arrayed in strange disguise as wild men; and on one occasion the Pagans fell upon them in great masses and slaughtered them, and then gave out that they found the Christian rites guarded by wild and hideous figures who were the devils that protected the Christians. From this point, and from the famous massacre that gave rise to the legends of the Walpurgis Night, we find this Satan, the adversary, assumes a new form. He is now arrayed in all the grotesque and fabulous imagery of a Satyr, or man of the woods; he appears in all that fabled ugliness in which the mysteries of old Christian times represented them.

It is now our purpose to present you with a brief view of the philosophy of evil, not only as taught by those who from the spirit-world are in realization of its truth, but from that stand-point of reason, that plane of observation, which man himself possesses. So far from man ever having enjoyed any exemption from pain, or suffering, or sorrow, all that remains of civilization points back to those primeval times when man was a poor uninstructed savage. When in that savage state there was in his nature that perpetual and intuitive yearning for higher and better conditions which is the voice of the Infinite himself prompting man forward to the fulfillment of his destiny. By this means the poor savage, shrinking beneath the ministrations of cold and hunger, learns to erect for himself dwellings, to prepare clothing, and search for food. The principle of eternal progress renders him restless, and dissatisfied with the rude and barbarous conditions of early civilization. The troglodyte caves of man's first habitation do not satisfy him, and he learns to erect more commodious buildings, and he aspires to yet higher and better conditions. We are not instructed alone by our five senses; there are the realms of intellect, each one of which is full of appetite that must be satisfied. Our eye not only supplies our brain or mind through the sense of sight, and instruct us in the nature of form, but there is a craving for beauty which is perpetually urging us to produce it, to re-create that which is displeasing to the eye in fairer and more graceful forms. We are not only instructed through the sense of hearing, but that sense must be cultivated, and sweet tones alone will satisfy the ear that has once learned to appreciate the difference between noise and music. There is the realm also of the emotions. Our affections must be satisfied; each one of them is a fresh incentive to action, a fresh demand which we must supply with action and effort, when we realize the entire construction of society we find that there is not one creature that is a duplicate of the other. If we question why are not all creatures created good, and strong, and beautiful, and happy, we ask again, what is life? Life is motion. What is motion? Action. What prompts us to action but this craving unrest of the appetites of the intellect and the affections, this demand for knowledge, this yearning for higher life? These promptings create that unrest and discontent which we so vaguely call evil. As societies aggregate into nationalities, the strong inevitably gravitate to the places of power; the abuse of power creates autocracy, and the strong seek to impose the bondage of the strong upon the weak, of the wise upon the ignorant. Thus arise those great varieties of condition which we so constantly deplore in great national congregations of men. But even then, mark the working of the scheme. When we attempt to analyze the history of any art or science, any human achievement, we ever find that the ministration of that which we call evil—hunger, want, necessity—was been the goad which has urged man on to effort. By the beautiful temple of Life stand the twin angels of Pain and Death. Within the temple are all the glorious achievements of Mind. There are all the possibilities of intellectual power which the mind can grasp; there is the field of the universe outspread, every department of which man must learn for himself by effort; and as he enters this beautiful temple of light, behold the action and ministration of pain. Pain stands beside human form to guard its integrity, to urge it on to exercise lest it rust, to guard it from excessive exertion lest it be overborne by effort, to warn it to temperance, to drive it back from vice, to guard it from excess in any direction. Through such ministrations the world has grown wise; and this ministering angel ceases not to instruct us even in the moment when she yields the human form to the higher and grander ministry of Death. Then, as the memory of pain and disease is impressed upon the survivor, he examines and searches into the marvel of that form, and thus he founds the science of anatomy, comprehends the marvelous grandeur of the human structure, and learns the wonderful sources of life and being which ultimate in the science of physiology. The unrest which sends him forth from place to place, prompts him to search and gauge the mystery of the pathless waste of ocean, and teaches him navigation. Every sinking ship is a portion of the ministry of the angels of Pain and Death; the wild shriek of the drowning mariner, the tossing arms of the dying victims, are all so many appeals to posterity to search deeper, to analyze more profoundly, until the science of navigation grows broader and deeper, and the intellect of man compasses even the knowledge of how to control and battle the elements. Every monition to pity, every demand upon our attention, either to feed the hungry, clothe the naked, or minister to the afflicted, is urging our better nature higher and higher, developing those godlike qualities within us which are creating the highest and the most beautiful preparation for that heaven which we call love. Even the dark and baleful conditions which we see in the lowest depths of poverty and crime are perpetually moving forward. The very fact that we observe them, that we believe them to be scourges, that they reproach us with their existence, is the best evidence that we must ultimately conquer them.

Again you question the nature of crime. I answer you, with the old metaphysicians, that just so long as the pure spirit is associated with matter, just so long as the demands of the physical appetites and the appetites of our senses with us grow out of the association of spirit and matter, just so long must we realize that we have to pass through all the series of temptations which too often ultimate in crime. Whence comes crime? From want, and disease, and ignorance—ignorance both among the rich and the poor. Do not mistake. While we tax home upon humanity all the faults and failings to which it is subject, we do realize that instead of proceeding from any failure in creation, it is the purpose of the Infinite, mapped out to us, to call man up from the lowest conditions through the perpetual and unceasing paths of progress to higher. Evil is the relative state in which we, from a certain stand-point, observe the conditions that are below ourselves. We do not tell you this by way of offering you that philosophy of Fatalism that shall neutralize action, or make you satisfied with the scheme, and paralyze your efforts of advancement.

Do not mistake the philosophy which so perpetually insists that whatever is is right, as applying to man, rather than to the scheme of the Infinite. In God's providence, whatever is, is right. He has ordained all things for good, and all things in harmony and beauty. But we are not God; nor have we achieved these sublime heights of rest, and beauty, and perfection of which we believe spiritual existence is capable. It is our part not to mistake right and wrong; to recognize the true object of the ministration of evil as an incentive to conquest. The darkest national sins that now surround us, are all prompting us to those higher and nobler conditions in which reason shall prevail instead of brute force, or the mere accidental prerogatives of birth and station. The very nature of poverty and suffering for which we are so constantly pleading, besides instructing us in the kindly sympathies and tender pity that shall alleviate the suffering, is such as to warn us to various systems of reform, to methods of education, to more just, more equable, more divine and harmonious national as well as individual conditions.

We have all of us passed through the garden of Gethsemane, stood on Golgotha, mounted some Calvary publicly or privately; or, if not, be sure that we shall do so, and that for our own soul's culture, our own spiritual development, we must all be men of sorrows and bear one another's burdens. I cannot exempt myself from the misery which is seething and surging around me in the dark lanes and alleys where the restless feet of the houseless are wandering this inclement night. The air is laden with the sorrow of our brothers and sisters; and it is the ministration of sympathy, born of the angel of Pain, that teaches us that our duty is not alone conquest for ourselves, but struggle for our kind. This ministry of pain, we find, is perfect in all its parts; and this feeling of unrest that is pervading every home and every heart in this our rudimental state shall never cease until all humanity share with us the brightness and the blessing which we enjoy.

The wise and kind Father has not forgotten those who are the victims of this scheme. It is a portion of the providence of the God of all the spirits, it would seem, that all our martyrdoms are means of purification. We are instructed by those who return to us, their feet yet bleeding, their brows yet torn by the thorns that have pierced them, that in the spirit-world this great and blessed discipline of suffering and sorrow is as much the means of purification as the efforts which the brave and the strong make here upon earth. Redeemed and glorious beings return to us, and ever assure us that as they look back upon the path of martyrdom they have trod, they could not afford to part with a single sorrow. Be assured that, whatever your state, whatever your position, whatever the darkness by which you are surrounded, you are of as much importance in God's scheme as any of the bright and shining worlds that sparkle above our heads this night. And if ye are so, what would you be if you were to pluck out of the chain of your past destiny any one of those events which have made you what you are? You may call this fatalism; but no—the very power that enables you to judge, the very reason that enables you to speculate upon the very path you have trod, is your prompter to move on to a fairer, brighter path. It is not because God's scheme is perfect in its workings that we are not part of the work. We too are workers in it; and let us never forget that it is through our work, our instrumentality, that that scheme is outwrought. It is with this assurance that for all sorrow, and wrong, and martyrdom, there is a bright compensative hereafter, that we close our review of the origin and ministry of evil.

We have no malignant spirit on which to shoulder our shortcomings. Like Jesus of Nazareth, we may say to one another, "I have chosen you, and you are a devil." We may say thus to ourselves. Within our own human hearts is the only devil that prompts us to wrong, the only adversary that ever becomes the hindrance to the perfection of our destiny. Look to it, then, and instead of shouldering your faults and shortcomings upon the imperfection of the creative scheme—instead of supposing that ye will benefit by the merits of another—realize in the bright example of Him who died to prove the truth of his sayings and not to excuse your sins, that the destiny of man in his rudimental state is to be a man of sorrows, to struggle bravely and hopefully to the very last.

The Hierophant; or Gleanings from the Past. By G. C. Stewart. 232 pp.

The author of this work was led to its preparation by the favor with which a series of lectures on Biblical Astronomy, delivered in different localities, were received, and the general desire on the part of thinking minds, for their appearance in book form.

In his preface, Mr. Stewart modestly disclaims the possession of literary talent; but in an admirable manner he has performed the task of gathering and arranging the scattered remnants of a world-wide system of worship and belief, which, under different names, has been perpetuated in the various forms of religion, and yet continues to affect the modern Christian, as it gave law to the pagan world. Having for a primary object the imparting of truth and the removing of the veil that bigotry has thrown over the past, Mr. Stewart has brought to bear the patient researches of years in separating truth from error, explaining the causes of the belief of bygone generations concerning the mystical relations between man and the planetary hosts, and the true interpretation of those ancient symbols and phrases, yet employed by Masons and other orders, which had a value and beauty in their inception, but have been perverted by the ignorance of succeeding ages."

Although not attaching the importance of those of Mr. Stewart's school to the claims of astrology as a science, we have been greatly interested, glancing over this volume, to note the light shed on things obscure, by the laborious research of the compiler; and, impressed with his fairness of treatment, we heartily recommend the volume to all who may desire a better acquaintance with the subject.—The National Standard, New York.

Hall's Journal of Health has acquired fame for its energetic, pronounced and common-sense suggestions in the matters of which it treats. Dr. Hall its editor, has now issued a volume exhibiting the same characteristics, entitled "Health by Good Living," which we cordially commend to all who have any occasion to take care of their own health, or that of others, a subject of special consideration. We can not help thinking, not only that a great many lives might be saved by the careful study of this manual, and good heed to its directions, but that many more might be lifted up from a plane of half-life to one of greatly increased vigor, comfort, and usefulness. We go for any doctor, who preaches plain food, fresh air, and much exercise out of doors.—Congregationalist and Boston Recorder.

Below, we quote three leading papers, in their review of that fascinating book, "Rebecca; or A Woman's Secret."

"The plot of the story shows genius of a high order, and its development shows the scholar and the writer. The sentiments and arguments proclaim the strong thinker, while the style is so easy and beautiful, that one glides almost imperceptibly from point to point in the unfolding of the story, intensely interested down to the successful ending. Vice appears as vice in this truthful book, and virtue and truth have their appropriate crowning."—The Evening Press, Providence, R. I.

"It is an absorbingly interesting volume."—The Evening Journal, Chicago.

"No candid reader can peruse this book without the knowledge that it is the protest of a sincere, earnest woman against the wrongs which woman suffers, and the evils which society suffers, and not a few will admire the story-setting of her essay."—The Daily Tribune, Chicago.

The Radical for April will attract the attention of scholars and thinkers, as it will contain a paper of great length by Francis Gerry Fairfield on "The New Philosophy," in which Mill, Huxley, Spencer, and Bain are critically considered as the Exponents of Modern English Thought. The "Conversations" of Goethe and Muller, translated by C. Shackford, and now running through the monthly numbers of this magazine, are highly spoken of. T. W. Higginson contributes to the May issue of "The Radical" a number of "Unpublished Letters from Theodore Parker."

"For some time past Andrew Jackson Davis, by his searching and rational criticisms of Spiritualism, has excited the distrust of the more unreasoning and sectarian of the representatives of that movement. His last work—"The Fountain, with Jets of New Meanings"—was well calculated to increase this apprehension. In a recent free conversation with a reporter of the New York World, with additional strictures, Mr. Davis has put the last feather upon the backs of those who before feared, and who now oppose him. The Spiritual Monthly, of Boston, now warns mediums—'the martyrs of the nineteenth century,' that Mr. Davis is not with, but against them! Mr. Davis renders valuable aid to rational Spiritualism, and strengthens the confidence of many of the doubting and skeptical in immortality and the rational spiritual life, by holding Spiritualists to the same searching test of common sense which he has been wont to apply to the thoughtless and illogical of other sects."—National Standard, New York

MEDIUMSHIP OF A. J. DAVIS.

By J. L. Potter.

As much has been said of late in the various papers concerning A. J. Davis being a medium, I wish to present his own words regarding this subject, rather than what Mary F. Davis may say or think. And to far as his resenting or denying the fact of spirit communion, I have never seen it.

Please turn to page 52 of "Death and the After Life, and read: "It is known, and it can be demonstrated, the witnesses are nearly all living in this world, that this subject of the future life came upon me years ago. I stood before you educated to some extent by that advent. The realities and scenes of the future came to me more silently and gradually than the flower unfolds, from its earliest germinal beginning. I was very much of a child in mind and body, and in years also, when the spirit world was first opened to my vision. So far as I myself was conscious, it came without any preparation, without any expectation, without any theory whatever, and without any imagination with reference to what man's future state would be."

On page 53d and 54 h, read: "My position is that of a person who, without forethought or intellectual preparation, became slowly acquainted with realities and scenes that were transmitted, or 'impressed,' day by day, from a higher sphere, until two whole years had transpired before them, at the end of these two years, of a blessed mental unfolding, which only the spiritual metaphysicians can truly explain to your understanding; the beautiful memories which had been thus gradually deposited within me came out and stood in my presence forward, and said 'Remember those things.' Instantly my external life, with its memories, was blended and married sweetly at the altar of the 'superior condition.' And I stand before you as one who has continued these sublime investigations every forenoon, whenever my physical and external conditions were favorable for an entire cerebral abstraction, by which the physical world is shut out and the internal sensorium opened."

What does Mr. Davis have to do to get these manifestations? Turn to page 50, and read:

"Whenever I wish to obtain these visional results by voluntary telecopic clairvoyance, I do not seek opium or hashcash; neither Arabian, Hebrew, Bohemian or Gipsey incantations; nor do I clog my digestive organs, nor highly stimulate my nerves, but there comes, as Daniel expresses it, a period of 'fasting,' and of constant, though not over urgent desire. Sometimes I have been obliged to continue this from four to six weeks before my nervesystem was perfectly still, my blood cool, my senses indifferent to the outer world. Then I could concentrate the perceptive faculties, and bring into action all the requisite organs, and, under the control of intuition, direct them upon remote earthly objects, or scenes super terrestrial."

Does Mr. Davis see and commune with spirits the same as all seeing mediums?

On page 59 and 80 he says: "On the 21st day of August, 1859 while making clairvoyant examinations, and writing upon the second part of this volume, I realized a gush of thoughts surcharged with the irresistible longings, rejoicings, love and nature and visitation of James Victor Wilson. The wave soon subsided, however, and I was, as before, only occupied with the subject of my writing. The next day the same beautiful thoughts of him, and the same internal rejoicing for the supernal presence pervaded my whole mind. But these meditations and longings, as before, passed gently and utterly away. This experience was repeated from day to day until the 30th, the early morn of which dawned with the person of my brother hovering in its wings. He came with his accustomed gentleness, stood close by the open window at which I was writing, and we conversed as naturally as any two spirits ever did. While engaged thus, my friend would depart from the window, whither, I knew not; but he invariably returned in time to correct any mistake in conception or spelling."

Who else did he converse with?

On page 47, read: "Katie, my former companion, came to me, as reported in "The Penetralia," and said she was then to start upon a journey, she knew not whither, nor when she would return, and she impressively began the journey, and has not yet returned, or I should have met with her."

How did Mr. Davis get the idea of a Children's Progressive Lyceum?

On page 64 read: "It was this Zilliahgen Society that first adopted the beautiful name now called the Children's Progressive Lyceum. They began, as we saw, by the distribution of twelve groups. The groups were designated and regulated according to the ages of their members; that is to say, according to the ages of lessons for the day and song, and not according to ages kept by the almanac."

Where is this spirit world? In it so far away?

On page 36, read: "No; the spirit world is not remote. We move, every moment, in its presence. This earthly planet itself rolls in its orbit under the observation of the inhabitants of the Spirit Land."

On page 51, read; "The spirit world is thus brought into our actual experience, and the very life of it is seen and realized."

How do we know there is a spirit world, and our friends live there?

On page 17, read: "Clairvoyants and mediums see this, and they know it is true. Many are the witnesses to these celestial facts."

Does Mr. Davis bring messages from spirits to us mortals?

On page 100, read: "Mr. Wilson now appeared once more disposed to bid me an adieu and said: 'Arabula, my brother!'

I asked whether he had not something more for me or the world, and his valedictory words as he was passing onward were:

'Tell mankind, my brother, that the universe is a volume of holy writing, the title page whereof, not even the highest seraph has altogether read. Tell them that the centre of all Creation is a holy hearted Pavilleum, a fountain of eternal love and wisdom; that it floweth impartially throughout the encircling existences, and that we drink from it as from an ocean of pure water.'"

Do spirits appear in the spirit world?

On page 73, read: "There are persons who still verily believe that the Roman Catholic faith is still God's exclusive religion. Such spirits hover over their congenial earthly congregations, therefore the Roman Catholics do experience real inspirations, etc."

Should communications conflict with each other?

On page 23, read: "Is it reasonable to demand universal oneness? Is it rational to suppose that the man who went up from Africa, and the native of Turkey, should each report from the next sphere exactly what an American would who died the day before yesterday, with all the twists and adaptations of education in his memory? Sameness is what men demand who call themselves 'reasonable!'"

On page 25, he says: "But there is no special wisdom in the leaders and members of the celestial brotherhood."

Thus I have given you friend Davis' own words. Now, can he, or any one else, say that he is not a medium? Webster says "A medium is the means or instrument by which an agent acts, or is acted upon." When is the medium who does not have to fast and keep themselves in readiness to receive the heavenly guests that come to them? I know of none.

Friend Davis has a right to state what he does not believe, and I have a right to say that I do not take any stock in his non-immortality theory, as stated on page 49 and 67 of same volume; or that a spirit has to remain in the room after leaving the body, until a door has been opened for its egress, as he says on page 57, of same book. Friend Wilson's Apozes, has answered the question very nicely. On page 93, he says:

"You are yet impatient to mount higher than you can see, and hasty to hold that wisdom than your spirit can comprehend. This aspiration is poisoned with ambition, and this ambition is the tempter which prompts you to appear to be more than you are, and to seem to know what you do not."

If we jump at conclusions, we can never arrive at the real truth. Opinions are good for nothing, without corroborative testimony. Let us weigh every proposition before passing judgment, and the world will be the better for it.

On page 88, Mr. Davis says: "If you can demonstrate my personal history in these particulars not to be real, publish it in your papers, and I will agree to pay you one hundred dollars for every line of such demonstration." I am, so ever, searching for the right.

CURES BY SPIRITS—HOW EFFECTED.

By Wm. B. Fahnestock.

Did you ever see, know, or hear of spirits healing any one who was not mediumistic, or capable of entering the somnambulic condition? I am constrained to say that I have not.

All the cases described, or given in detail, have been in persons who were mediumistic, or capable of entering the somnambulic condition. This being so, there must be a reason why it is not otherwise.

All cures of this kind have heretofore been ascribed to a wonderful influence, or a magnetic power in the spirit to effect them; but no one has ever demonstrated or proved, outside of their assertions, how it was done.

In examining this subject, many facts have been developed which go to prove that most observers have taken appearances for facts, and given them to the world as truths; but because a patient gets well after the laying on of hands, or by officiating in any other way, it does not prove that there is a magnetic power in the officiator, or of a spirit through him, that effected the cure, for there cures are often made without any such interference, simply by an act of the subject's own will.

Faith, or a belief in the power of any one, whether spirit or man, will restore the health of those who believe; not because it is a power or an influence in the officiator or spirit, but by the subject's faith, who, under the excitement of the moment, imagines, believes or desires that the disease shall pass away, and this can only be done when they are in a susceptible condition: spirits, then have the power to impress their minds to that effect.

This is the only way that they can influence those who are susceptible and as it is impossible for them to effect cures in those who are not susceptible, or capable of entering the somnambulic condition, it certainly proves that it can only be accomplished through the mind of those who are cured.

The facts compel me to say this in the face of all that has been said about the magnetic power of spirits, or the cures that are said to have been effected by them, many of which have been detailed by hearsay; but, granting that they really were made, they no doubt were so upon the principle of faith on the part of the subject, or by impressions outside of any magnetic power in the spirit.

It is much more rational to suppose that when subjects are in a susceptible condition that their minds can be so impressed by spirits as to effect cures, than in any other way, even if they possessed the magnetic power ascribed to them; for those who have not only taken appearances for facts, but imagined that because a cure was effected, that it necessarily must have been done by magnetism, instead of a direct impression upon the susceptible mind of the subject, by the spirit controlling.

I am fully aware that many spirits believe that they effect cures by a magnetic influence, and often go to a great deal of unnecessary trouble to get susceptible persons to aid them in effecting cures; but they could effect them just as well at any time when the subject is in condition; but under the circumstances, as now understood by them and by subjects, it is necessary to get up faith in some way, and that seems to be the only way possible in some way that will bring about the proper condition and fix the mind of the subject upon the disease. But the end in view could be more easily attained by impressing the mind of the subject at once, when it is in a susceptible condition.

It is impossible for those who are not familiar with the powers of the somnambulist, to form a correct idea of what is possible for them to accomplish; and, if it is possible for them to create and feel pain in any part of their body, by an act of their own will, what can they not effect when their mind, whether by instruction, impression, or of their own accord, is properly directed?

That they can create or relieve pain in any part of their body, at will, even when their health is in a normal condition, I know, and being able to do this, the great question of power is settled, and must exist in the will or faith of the subject; all appearances and assertions to the contrary, notwithstanding.

The most successful operators who have practiced the laying on of hands, are aware of the fact that there is no power in themselves, and although they have acknowledged it in private, they have shirked the question in public; deeming it easier to drift with the current than to struggle against it.

As for myself, although I am sorry to differ from so many friends, I love the truth too well to let any other considerations prevent me from worshiping at its shrine.

THE SPEAKERS' CLUB.

Letter to D. W. Hull.

D. W. Hull—Dear Brother: I am pleased to see the earnestness with which your recent letter addressed to me is written. And as you evidently understand in turn the sincerity and logic of my position, I, can only hope that, by a mutual aim and object before us—viz: "The greatest good to the greatest number," ourselves included, we may not fail to find an answer to your closing doubts and perplexities. So far as mutual acquaintance and "fraternal feeling among mediums and lecturers" are concerned, I cannot conceive how the Club offers any greater advantage than we otherwise possess. The "machinery" of the club certainly seems to me inadequate thereto. The offensive features thereof cannot but prove, at least in cases of "delinquency," a fruitful source of bitterness; and how this society can be called a purely "benevolent" one, I cannot understand. For the life of me, in digging down to its foundations, and measuring its grandest prospective proportions, I cannot find one solitary or solid support and security in it. Suppose you are a member, and, of course, perfectly in harmony with the movement; in time, you get into—you are here in Louisville, or in Cincinnati, or Baltimore, or away in some rural district, 50 miles from the railroad—you must wait till negotiations with the board in Boston (for the present) bring you the sum of their deliberations, and, perhaps, a sum of money. In the meantime you are just as dependent upon the charity of your host as though you were not a member of that club. In case of delay, and previous inability, to meet that, and other monthly tax, away you go, cut loose, or sent down the stream of chance, with a big placard on your back—"Delinquent."

It is too bad that really good, well-meaning men will make such mistakes. Now, providing you were sick in any one of these places referred to, could you not command in the way of ordinary charity all and more than the Club or Club promises you? Surely, I cannot doubt for a moment that were it my case, here, at this time, the friends of Louisville would be faithful and prompt in relieving my necessities,—and do it, too, without the least claim upon any monthly stipend. Do not let us think we are left so friendless as many imagine. Let us, in our meetings of yearly reunion, bring this subject before the people; let us, instead of wasting our time upon theoretical organizations, which, in place of a sound center or heart to the movement, keep eternally before us the spectacle of a forced or shattered treasury, begin to luxuriate in the spontaneous, exuberant, overflowing springs of genuine sympathy that await us in our own field of labor. Let us have the good old-fashioned rally, and talk to the people from the true impulses and inspirations of the soul and I will warrant you when they understand our true mission to be on the side of humanity and unselfishness, they will not leave us to suffer. Indeed, I have not been sick for years, without finding the best of friends, and better care than any club as yet promises me. Compulsory, arbitrary measures do not suit the people. Toleration is not principle. To force a member to pay for no benefit, is no benefit at all. To take his money from him in his greatest need, and arrogantly claim the right to dispose of it in another direction, is a cruel infraction of the best and noblest principles of brotherhood.

Again, I repeat it, our country is alive with warm, kindly and liberal souls, who will do far better by us than this. When they learn that you are "a missionary to the world, and carry the gospel at your own expense," they will want to share the glory with you; and when they find you so far above the fear of "the Devil," as to meet him in your own individual strength, you will continue to find plenty on "the Lord's side." If our mediums and lecturers are "too sensitive to report themselves," still I do not see that the club could find them any sooner than ordinary friendship. But let us ventilate this subject more fully at our forthcoming Northwestern Speaker's Convention and grand Mass Meeting, which is to come off at Decatur, Ill., in the large Opera Hall of E. D. Smith, Esq., on the first week of June next. We hope this Convention may be one of harmonious reunion by which both speakers and people may get very close in heart, and show to the world of Cotton Mather diplomacy, the M. D.'s and D. D.'s of modern despotism, how strong is our army of volunteers, who are springing to the rescue of American liberty. Give us all the way from one to fifty dollars a Sunday," but never the inglorious name of having deserted our standard for the paltry sum by which we may be merely bought to the service. It ought to be our greatest glory to win by moral heroism and the fortitude that all true souls evince in a sacred cause, and then we know the pensions come only to the brave and loyal. Thanking you for your kind letter, believe me, most fraternally and truly,

THE "SEARCH AFTER GOD."

Reply to Wm. F. Lyon.

As you have kindly admitted my criticism on Brother Francis' "Search after God," I will, as briefly as I can, refer to Mr. Lyon's remarks on my strictures. His inferences as to my position and meaning were unwarranted and unfounded. He could not know that my remarks and ideas were not the result of patient research, and whether they were or not, it had nothing to do with the truth or falsity of my statement. He admits that all races of men, in all ages of the world, have all had an incomprehensible, infinite Being; and yet, all have claimed partially to comprehend him. Well! is this unreasonable? May we not know or comprehend something of infinite space, at least to the extent of our travels, though in its totality, it is incomprehensible. We may comprehend ages, yet not infinite duration. We do not pretend to know more of God than He has made known to us, nor does it concern us what He did in the eternity past, so much as what He is,—what He requires of us, what we are, and are to be. His laws are principles co-eternal with Himself, and were not of subsequent origin. A. J. Davis says in his "Arcana," page 233, (which see) in reference to the subject of your question: "No one but a fool will ever ask what was before the Eternal, what is greater than the Infinite. That reason suggests the query,—what caused the fountain; what is above the Infinite? This is the first question of infancy, and the last of old age."

From the manner in which my opponent treated my advice as to prayer, I fear he has never tried its efficacy, but like Mr. Davis, that man has an affectional nature, that is as intuitive as his intellectual. I again advise my enquiring brother to try it faithfully, and I assure him he will not feel disposed again to treat it with levity, not to say contempt.

I believe in an eternal, self existent, independent Being,—the upholder of all things, and their primal Cause,—illimitable in His immensity,—inconceivable in the mode of His existence and essence,—known fully only by Himself,—being Omniscient, He can not mistake,—an Infinite by God, He can do nothing wrong,—the Soul of the universe. He is the intelligent Cause. Nature the effect, and the eternal progression of all effects the result. If a personality, He fills the universe; and if a principle, He is one of intelligence, goodness and power; intelligence to devise, goodness to propose the best results of being, and power to execute. Blind chance is not accommodated by any system of action, and would be no more likely to express design or intelligence, than the printer's type thrown without order upon a form to result in sentimental and sublime poetry.

As a foundation for further comment, I quote from the "Search after God:"

"Man and not God was connected with the organization of matter into worlds and systems of worlds. A large portion of mankind attribute the creation of this earth and the other planets to an Infinite, Omniscient, Omnipotent God. They have no foundation whatever upon which to predicate such a supposition. * * * What! Man make a planet,—launch into the regions of space a comet, or organize a system of worlds for the unfoldment of other races of human beings? Yes; we say, emphatically,—yes, and care not a straw for the denial of others. Worlds and systems of worlds bow to the touch of man. Force is to anything in nature that was made by God. Individualized man is the moving cause of creation. Do we declare that man conceived, made, and launched the earth into the regions of space? Most assuredly we do. We propose to prove that an Infinite God is an impossibility. All the Gods we have found, are myths. No Omnipresent God made this earth."

According to this theory, creation is the work of finite organized intelligences, persons that once had no being; but like Mr. Fox's God, was developed from the lowest form of matter. As them, they had a beginning, who presided during their minority? As there were, perhaps, millions of worlds in space, created and governed by these finite individualized beings, did they act in concert, under a presiding officer, or did they act independently each of the other? Spirits say they occasionally need rest. Now, if, during the suspension of their generally continued supervision and toil, (as you say in your last that nature can not act without a supervising intelligence—anything without it would end in chaos), if during this cessation of watching, a wheel in the complicated machinery of the world they govern should break, or get out of gear, what security is there that this, and other mishaps, would not be involved in anarchy and ruin? Again, as these finite creators and governors are not Omnipresent, who presides over that part of infinite space not occupied by them? If you say their supervision is extended, will you please to calculate and inform me how many finites it will take to fill infinite space, and if the supervision of the president of their republic is unbounded, wherein does he differ from an Omnipresent God?

You admit that there will always continue to be a cloud of mystery ahead of man. How, then, do you know whether it is man or God that creates and governs? You deny a God, because you have never seen him. Have you ever seen any more of a man than you have of a God? You have never seen the spirit of either, but you have seen enough of the harmonies of the heavens that declare his glory to induce your belief in the unseen spirit of an Infinite Intelligence.

You are dogmatic without proof in asserting an Infinite God an impossibility. You say your spirit prompter declares the Infinite God made the earth. Well, let us compare notes with your and other unseen witnesses. The spirit of Professor Dayton, that speaks through Thomas Gales Forster, says:

"The Spiritualist believes that infinite love and wisdom combined, is ruling all worlds; that his God is Omnipresent and all-powerful; the divine principle of intelligence who is above all, through all, and in all; incomprehensible, except through the majesty and beneficence of His works."

The spirits that speak through Mrs. Hardinge, Fishbaugh, Tappan, and others, invariably controvert the atheistical voice of the spirit that speaks through Brother Francis. Who should be believed? If spirit testimony is thus discordant, we must fall back upon our individual reason.

Reader, if you have not read A. J. Davis' "Arabula" containing a chapter on "God revealed to the intellect," delay not to get it and read it, and I doubt not the cure of your skepticism on this subject.

CONGRATULATORY.

Still Another Victory.

What will energy and perseverance not accomplish, when the great cause of truth and justice is the object sought. Another glorious victory has been achieved; another grand success realized. The preying doctors, with their tool, the Chicago Tribune, have come to grief. Their unjust bill, regulating the practice of medicine, was defeated by an almost unanimous vote, all the Democrats, with two exceptions, voting against it.

"The best laid schemes
Of mice and men,
Gang aft agley."

Shake hands all around. Business. Accept my thanks for your hearty responses and co-operation, in so gallantly coming to the rescue. When I first presented the matter to Bro. Jones, he at once gave it his hearty support, and opened up the columns of his valuable paper for the publication of my articles,—the same when taken to the Chicago Tribune they would publish by my paying some hundred dollars per article. I could not see it.

Spiritualists, you have gained bright laurels in this contest. More await you. It moreover behooves you to be on the qui vive, exerting yourselves, and defending your rights, your principles, and your sacred honor, by upholding and supporting the most fearless and outspoken religious journal in America. Tis your only safety, in extending wide its circulation, so that when the occasion demands, the people can be aroused, and virtue and liberty be gained and protected, and demagogues and tyrants be overthrown and defeated.

Had it not been for the truly vigorous efforts of the Religio-Philosophical Journal this selfish, murderous bill undoubtedly would have become a law. Too much credit can not be awarded to this paper and its fearless editor. Freedom, rally around this exponent of our faith, this standard-bearer of the free. Send in your subscriptions. Work with a will.

So far as my own personal interests are concerned, I had no ax to grind. Many of our best mediums have no diplomas (and need none) but by my holding my peace the bill might have passed, and then they being banished from the State, might have added a few more paltry dollars to my income. Be that as it may, I feel impressed to say that I have not only my credentials from high heaven and mother Nature, but diplomas from leading colleges in America, which are as long and as broad as those of any regular quack M. D. in Cahcago.

It grieves me to say, that when earnestly, diligently working to get all the names here in the city I could. I was cut to the bone by the the little interest manifested by a few leading members of the Society of Spiritualists here in Chicago, who did not sign this remonstrance. We, however, did not need these flunkey, bigoted, stereotyped individuals' names. We survive! All is well!

Spiritualism, I opine, means more than Sunday after Sunday going through mere heartless forms and ceremonies in a church, in a hall, or one of either. Spiritualists, be on your guard against all men or organizations of men, that swallow up your individuality.

Spiritualism is a child of freedom; no dome, save the swelling canopy of heaven can give it a kindly parental shelter.

Spiritualists of Michigan, to the rescue! Your rights and sacred private privileges as citizens of a free country are also invaded. The bill just defeated in this State will become a law in yours, if you do not act—act with a will and purpose. Take the remonstrance published in the Journal, get extra copies; send one to each member of the House. Sign your own names, and all that you can obtain to sign it. Don't wait, I beseech you, for others to act for you, but up and at this monstrosity, nail and tooth, hip and thigh, "No quarter" the watchword and reply.

We have private letters from individuals in Illinois, who personally obtained hundreds of names, whose committee of one was acting as one man to put down this unjust bill.

GRAND MASS MEETING.

Letter From Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson.

As it is near the Anniversary of our North Western Speakers' Convention, which took place at Joliet, Ill, it is now proposed to hold our next yearly meeting at Decatur, Ill, where the friends are making very liberal preparations for it; and we have been offered the fine Opera Hall of our friend E. O. Smith, Esq, for the occasion. We have concluded to connect with the Speakers Convention, a grand mass meeting at which many prominent speakers and friends of the cause have promised to be present. Our Chairman, H. S. Brown, M. D., of Milwaukee, will publish the call in proper time; the date of the Convention will be the latter part of May, or 1st of June, as may be decided. We earnestly hope all interested in the life of religious and national freedom, will join with us at that time, as far as circumstances will permit; and those who cannot be present, will do our cause great favor by letters of co-operation. When it is known so well by us that the Evangelical Alliance is tightening the lines of its artful and designing policy, against all true liberty of conscience, and seeking to subvert the original design of our national charter, is not perilous to defer the fullest and clearest declaration of our patriotism and determination to defend the sacred right, our forefathers bequeathed us as their dying legacy? As Spiritualists, and Rationalists of every name, are especially aimed at by this Alliance of Church and State, let us unite in the most fraternal bonds of fellowship, and make invincible our columns in mutual self-defense against the destroyer of our liberties. Let us pass resolutions of co-operation and sympathy with "the Liberal Society" recently organized at Washington, for the same purpose, and then resolve to practically obey them. And let us forget the narrow limitations of names, and pledge ourselves to the might and integrity of our principles. In short, let us work for a Liberal Alliance, and let this Convention be one well worthy of its important object.

By request of my own honorable Chairman, and in unison with my own heartiest sympathies for our world-wide cause, I have penned the foregoing appeal.

PIONEER WORK

Letter from Dumont C. Dake, M. D.

Brother Jones:—In your last issue, I find the following remarks in regard to Brother Bailey:

"We might suggest that a good field for Dr. Bailey's labors would be Allegheny County, Penn. Pittsburg, with its suburbs, as a population of over three hundred thousand, and we doubt if its intelligence was ever blessed with a spiritual lecture. Here is a wide field for work—who will be the first to venture on this pioneer labor?"

Yes, here is a wide field for work. We formerly lived and practiced medicine in that county, and were one among a few earnest, determined souls, that banded together, hired a hall, and formed the first society of progressive Spiritualists in that place.

It created great excitement in that bigoted, priest-ridden city. Personally, I hired the most reliable test mediums, and gave private and public free seances. The daily papers gave startling accounts of the same, just as they did occur, three and four columns at a time. I have them now in my scrap-book. The following I find therein, clipped from the Spiritual Republic, of Chicago, May 4th, 1867:

"The Spiritualists of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, met on the 21st ult., and organized a Society, to be known as the Religious Society of Progressive Spiritualists. D. C. Ripley was elected President, and Dr. D. C. Dake, Secretary."

Again, I clip:

"Pittsburg, Penn. At a regular meeting of the Society of Progressive Spiritualists, held in Ashland Hall, August 15, George Rode, Esq., and Dr. D. C. Dake were elected delegates to attend the Fourth National Convention of Spiritualists at Cleveland, Ohio."

Up to the time of my leaving Pittsburg, the society were holding meetings.

At this time, I am not, however, advised, but I am confident that should Brother Bailey visit the "Iron City," so deeply veiled by the smoke of a thousand furnaces, and bid away in the deep recesses of the tall mountains that environ it, he might give them more light, and find a hearty welcome from the true and loyal-hearted reformers. Angels speed them.

Letter from D. H. Tiffany.

Brother Jones:—Please find inclosed, fifty cents for a new trial subscriber. When you get tired of those crumbs let me know, and I will not annoy you with them. I am really anxious that your paper should be in the hands of every intelligent person. I know that a great good can be done by reading the many good things that the paper contains.

Xenia, O., Mar. 6th, 1871.

Dear Brother:—Your labors are duly appreciated—not by us alone, but by many living in the higher life. The ocean is made up of drops. We appreciate your good-will in procuring a trial subscriber, the same as if you had sent us one for a full year. Let all follow your example, and the light of Spiritualism will shine in the dark nooks and corners, now shut in by a gloomy system of theology adapted only to the dark night of ignorance of past ages.—Ed. Journal.

Lecturer and Test Medium Wanted.

Brother Jones:—We are very much in need of a test medium and lecturer here, and adjacent towns in the Southwest. Can you not send one with both qualifications combined, either male or female?

We are denounced and ridiculed by the clergy in the pulpit, without the power of public redress, for we have no organized association or public speaker here, nor any one bold enough to meet them in the field of discussion, though we have many true believers in the truth of Spiritualism.

We think it too bad that we should be held up for public scorn by the ranting orthodoxy without the power of replying to their misrepresentations, and defining our own positions and sentiments in their true light. Will not some good missionary come, and trust to the generosity of their spiritual friends for pecuniary assistance, for we feel assured they will do all in their power to aid a good test medium and lecturer, in this place and adjoining towns.

To F. B. Dowd, the Rosicrucian.

Mr. F. B. Dowd—Dear Sir:—I attended your lecture last Thursday evening. Never heard one of its kind before. In my opinion you fully understand your business. I think, you represented courtship and marriage as they exist in fact, as well as explained what it should be. In fact, I was pleased with your lecture, and say, go on; God and all good persons will aid you."

WHO ARE THE WORLD BUILDERS?

A Chapter from a Book Entitled "The Hollow Globe:" by Wm. F. Lyon.

Concluded.

Moses and Joshua, David, Daniel and Paul talk very familiarly of the God of Gods and Lord of Lords, and, if they mean anything, they must mean that the one God is higher, and exercises authority over the others; the same of the Lord, as the term is used indiscriminately, to represent the same idea. The God referred to, and spoken of by Moses so constantly, must be far from an infinite being, as the history he concluisve upon this point, and shows him to be deficient in very many respects. He made great blunders, and then vain and unsuccessful attempts to remedy his mistakes. He did many things for which he manifested great sorrow and regret at a subsequent period, and he partially destroyed the results of his own labors. He could not have been the author and parent of the whole human race, for if so, he would have manifested the same parental care and solicitude towards the whole, and treated all his children in a similarly kind and fatherly manner, as any good, just and honorable father would be pleased to do. But we learn this Hebrew God chose one people as his especial favorites, and rejected the balance, treating them with great unkindness and severity. He made use of his own chosen people to drive the rejected nations from their homes, destroy their property, deprive them of their liberties and lives, and, in some instances, totally annihilate all except the virgins, who were spared for the use of the soldiery.

We perceive it would be impossible, taking all this history into consideration, to entertain a very exalted respect for the God who is represented in its pages. So far from being infinite, and entirely beyond a desire for earthly honors, and entirely exempt, he prescribed minutely the forms of worship he preferred, and the number pf beeves, and sheep, and birds, with which he would like to regale his senses, and we must rise from the perusal of that history, with the conviction that if there is an exalted being in this universe, all of whose attributes and perfections are infinite, then Moses and the fathers have not described him, neither could they have any rational conception of such a spiritual personality.

We notice, that we find certain material organisms we call human, possessed of spiritual entities, with peculiar and very numerous attributes, which we discover might exist independent of this particular form through which they now manifest themselves, and that such spirit entities only use their present forms, as a medium of manifestation and preparation for a more advanced condition of existence. One prominent thing we may say they are endowed with what is called immortality, is that they possess properties and attributes entirely distinct, and not at all dependent upon the gross, material particles composing their organisms; attributes that may as well exist in some other and higher condition. We clearly perceive that joy and sorrow, love and hatred, hope and fear, an ability to grasp thought, ideas and principles and to discriminate between truth and error, are attributes of spiritual entities, and not of gross material forms, and we can not doubt the continued existence of those spirit individualities who have in possession, characteristics and endowments of so sublime a nature.

We should look upon the author of our existence as extremely unjust and cruel, who could place within us, fondly cherished aspirations and lofty hopes, and then cut us off in the morning of our history, without any realization of those bright visions, that he had brought so prominently to our view; and as no such injustice and cruelty can exist, then the spirit personality must live. It must also live because the numerous attributes it has in possession, of which the spirit is composed, are eternal and can not die; and also, because it can cope with, grasp, and comprehend, and make its own, ever-living principles, and solve problems that have existed from all eternity, and will so continue. It will live because it is a living entity, a something, and can not be put outside of the realms of nature, and changed into nothing.

If we look along down through the lower forms of organized life, we shall find some living entities who can safely lay claim to a portion of the same characteristics that exist in the human organism. We have learned, that a marked feature in the spirit individuality of the human, was the possession of attributes which distinguish it from the grosser material, that may dissolve and fall into decay. The query now arises, with regard to the number of those attributes and endowments that might be required, to constitute a living spirit entity in the proper sense of the term. We shall find some human beings who possess vastly more endowments and attributes, than some others; but, it will be admitted that the weakest man or woman possess within themselves undying spirits. Then we find, that the imperishability of spirits, does not depend upon the number of their endowments, but upon the fact that they are spirits, or individualized living entities with certain attributes, they hold in common with the human race, however small may be the number of those attributes. If the number is small to-day, time, and the unchanging law of progress will necessarily carry all these spiritual entities to higher conditions.

We think, if we carefully examine the natural history of the dog, his habits, customs, peculiarities, endowments and qualifications, we shall be compelled to admit, there is much in him perfectly analagous to the human. Does he not manifest strong affection for his friends, remarkable fidelity, and care, patience and watchfulness, concern for his master's interests, and wonderful memory? Has he not combativeness, destructiveness, inhabitiveness, cautiousness, and an organized brain stored with various faculties, all ready to be called into activity, as occasion may require? Volumes might be filled with remarkable and very interesting incidents of canine sagacity and faithfulness, and all these traits of character, they hold in common with man, and many of them are classed among the higher virtues, when exhibited in the human race. Some of these animals appear so noble, that we form very strong attachments for them, and are almost inclined to bow with respect when they enter our presence, and there can be no doubt very many of them possess spirits entirely too large and expanded for the forms they inhabit, that are only waiting to go forward upon their journeys.

We call those same endowments immortal when they exist in man, and if so, why not in this lower organized being? We must conclude that the dog is possessed of spiritual qualities and attributes that must become an individualized entity. Such being the case, how can this entity has not been prepared to enter upon its future relations below him? If we are correct in our conclusion, that the dog has within him a living spirit entity, because we see in him qualities and characteristics distinct from his material form, and perfectly analagous to those in man, then we shall be forced to admit the same of all forms and organizations below the dog, both in the organic and inorganic realms. Suppose we examine a grain of sand, we find about one-half silicon, the other oxygen. It has form, extension, and qualities that are independent of the material, and though it has fewer attributes, it has sufficient to make it a spiritual entity, as well as a material form, as we see the silicon is the visible materialized portion, while the oxygen is a part of the invisible spiritual entity that exists in this particle of matter, and which has become an individualized entity, and must remain so when the silicon is dissolved. This spiritualized entity may charge its form and progress, but it can by no means be expelled from the universe, or changed to nothing.

If we admit that there must be spirit entities in any form of life below man because we find them possessing a sensuous nature, with organs, faculties, and all the attributes the same as man, then where shall we find the line that marks the boundaries, or the line of division upon which we may stand, and say, upon this side all forms have living spirit entities, upon that side they are destitute of such properties or attributes? Eternal progress must be an unmeaning term, else we shall be driven, without the least possibility of escape, to admit that the infinitesimal atom is possessed of a spirit entity that cannot die, that must rise through all the gradations and successions of aggregations and organic forms, unfolding and taking on at each step in its journey, until it ascends through the entire scale, to the highest condition of which the human mind can entertain a conception. We must adopt this idea, or abandon all idea of progressive existence, for, if we have progressed up to a given point, where could that progression have commenced, unless at the lowest? and, if we are to progress in the future, where can we terminate, but at the highest? if we can have any proper conception of the highest, or the ultimate of all progression.

Then, what can be required in order to produce worlds in accordance with eternal laws and principles existing within the boundaries of nature's realms? In answer, that we must have progressed, intelligent beings, who are able to bring to bear and manipulate the requisite forces, by which the atoms and corresponding spirit entities may be moulded into their million different forms, with sufficient time for the necessary evolutions. With these conditions, there can be no need of introducing a single miraculous interposition during the entire process, but, all may be accomplished, from their inception to their comparative maturity, in strict conformity with universal laws. But, we are asked, how all these things could have existed without being preceded by an infinite God? and we ask in return, how the supreme infinite God could have existed unless preceded by all those lesser things? and it is quite proper to inquire which theory concerning this matter is best sustained by universal facts and philosophy?

Now, what fact is there that clearly proves that a personality does now or ever did exist, who holds in his individual possession, all wisdom and all power? Not one; for we clearly perceive that those attributes are subdivided among untold millions of intelligences, and it follows that one single being cannot possess all that is so extensively divided. We are told that it would require infinite intelligence to produce all worlds. That might be so, but there is no proof, and far from any probability, that one being did produce all worlds; there was certainly no necessity, for there must have existed plenty of intelligences who knew how to build worlds from as remote a period as can be conceived of by the human mind. Should we look all over the broad universe for a fact which would sustain the hypothesis, that such an infinite being sprang into existence, possessing all knowledge and power, without previous experience, who framed and erected all the multitudinous laws by which nature is governed, in its various departments, who produced from nothing the atomic particles, out of which the globes are composed, we shall find no such fact, and surely all the analogies in the natural universe are in direct opposition to any such idea.

We do not wish by any means to deprive our friends, who stand in need of such a being, of their long-cherished idea of an infinite personal God, whom they have been honestly endeavoring to adore and worship with becoming reverence. But we say, without fear of successful contradiction, that if they ever really find the being whom they have vainly imagined, they must find him outside the realms of universal nature, in some imaginary domain which they will scarcely reach during all the eternities of the future, because nature embraces all there is, or ever will be in the material or spiritual worlds. Infinity means all of all things in the broadest sense of the term, so, it is absolutely impossible for one personality, whether it may be in unity or trinity, to possess and comprehend all, while other individual entities possess anything. If they have power to move a hand, that power belongs to them, together with all other forces inherent in their individualities.

When Jesus said to his disciples (if he said it), that "all power was given him in heaven and upon the earth," it was a terrible exaggeration, or else a simple mistake; for, take the literal history of this person in its broadest sense, and there is not a particle of evidence to prove the fact, that he was in possession of all power, either before or after his death. The history establishes conclusively, that he possessed but a limited amount of power, or that he, like others, was subjected to the control of law administered by higher powers. He certainly did not possess the power of the Jewish Sanhedrim, or the authority that Pilate received from the government at Rome. If he had, he certainly would not have perished upon the cross, an unwilling victim to Jewish hatred and prejudice. He surely would not have erected a cross for himself, and nailed his hands and feet to its timbers, or provided any other means for such a death; for then he would have been a suicide. He died then by a power and authority over which he exercised no control, and he evidently did not acquiesce in the arrangement, for if so, why was he agitated in such a manner as to sweat so profusely, "like great drops of blood running down to the earth?" Why did he pray so earnestly, saying, "If possible, let this cup pass from me, nevertheless, not as I will, but as thou wilt?" showing conclusively it was not his will to die, and that he only manifested that resignation which thousands of others, both before and after, have evinced in their trying moments. He, like the others, submitted to a fate which could not be averted by any power they could bring to bear.

All of his doings that are any way marvelous, are said to have been performed independent of, or in opposition to, natural laws; but what wonderful thing did he do, or could he have done, outside of the domain of nature? So far from having all power, he had not the least power or influence in any one of the civil governments then in existence. Does any one pretend that he possessed wisdom or power sufficient to superintend the construction of worlds, or that he could have supervised the building of a moon upon correct mechanical principles? We doubt much whether the most ardent Trinitarian ever conceived any such idea, or that he could even now, with all his additional experience, be competent to act in any such capacity, or perform any labor of that character. We are quite sure he never said he could, and he never during his earth-history, accomplish anything which would indicate that he possessed powers and abilities sufficient to have contrived and built a solar system, with all its complicated machinery; and that, would have been but a trifle compared to the whole. The power required to project and set in motion all the untold number of solar systems in the broad universal domain, would stretch infinitely beyond what would be required to produce the single system attached to our central sun.

Then how senseless and ridiculous has it been, through all the long ages, to deify this simple, unpretentious individual, and endow him with infinite wisdom and power, who never manifested sufficient ability to construct, and give life to the least insect, or animal organization, and who never made any pretensions to any knowledge of the original universal laws and principles which must be so prominent a portion of the wisdom of a God!

If it fully means all, it comprehends all there is of matter and spirit, of laws and forces, of space and time, of positives and negatives, of male and female, of life and death, and individual and collective forms, and if there is such a personality who embraces all these things, then all are absorbed and swallowed up in this infinite being, and the idea of infinite hosts of personal individualities, is a myth and a delusion, and not to be entertained. Again, if there is an infinitely omnipresent personality, who fills alike the immensity of space, then there can be nothing in space but that omnipresent person, else space, would be more than filled, which cannot be, and if this infinite being possesses all the knowledge in the vast universe, and all other infinite perfections, and has so possessed them from all eternity, then he is evidently devoid of some attributes and qualities of an essential character, as typified by lower spirit personalities. Because, with him there could be no change, and consequently he has no enlivening hopes or bright aspirations which may reach into the future, and the eternities of that future must roll on with him, in one dull, monotonous round eternally, destitute of the cheering expectations that animate the souls of all intelligences throughout the earthly and spiritual spheres. There can be no such thing as an unchangeable being, no matter how exalted he may be. Every day's experience must produce some change. The great universe moves onward in its ample rounds. It is not to-day precisely as it was yesterday, and something will be added to-morrow. Unchangeability is death, because it is a cessation of activity; where there is life there must be change, and when any positive living entity is prepared to live without change, he becomes negative, goes down into Holbrook, and there rests till he is ready to rise and go forward in the ever-changing history of all living intelligences, high or low.

MEDIUMS' DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory, giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. This will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the location of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time, that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

PARLOR ALBUM

IN FIVE QUARTO VOLUMES.

Price, $9.00 per volume, or

$40.00 PER SET COMPLETE.

Description of the Work:

THE PARLOR ALBUM is doubtless the most extensive ART GALLERY ever published, and, by those who have examined the several portions of the work, it has been pronounced, "The Climax of Beauty." Each volume contains 20 full page Chromo Lithographs, in Oil Colors, 40 full page Steel Engravings, 40 full-page Engravings on Wood, and 200 pages of reading matter, descriptive of the illustrations, the whole making each volume about one-half as thick, and same sized paper, as Webster's Largest Dictionary. Each volume is complete in itself, and will be sold separately, if desired. Sold by Subscription only.

Vol. I is devoted to Wild American Birds.
Vol. II Contains Wild American Animals.
Vol. III, American Domesticated Birds and Animals.
Vol. IV, Foreign Birds and Animals.
Vol. V, Fishes, Reptiles, and Insects.

This work will at once commend itself to the cultivated American people, and no library will, hereafter, be complete without this addition to its treasures; while as a parlor amusement it is unequalled by American publications.

Agents Wanted.

We will give agents very liberal terms for selling the above described publications, and wish to appoint an agent in every town in the United States and British Provinces. Experienced book agents, and all other persons of respectability should apply at once. Any young man or young lady can, by devoting a short time during the day or evening, secure a complete set, free of expense, or, if preferred, we will allow a large Commission in Cash.

We have prepared a most beautiful SPECIMEN BOOK FOR AGENTS, containing Five of the Oil Chromos, Ten Steel Engravings, Ten Wood Engravings, and 160 pages descriptive reading, being selections from each volume, together with blank paper, specimens of binding, etc., etc.

Our Specimen Book has cost us quite largely, and we do not wish to send it to persons who do not intend to act as Agents, but to any one who will make an effort to procure subscribers to the Work, we will send the Specimen Book, prepaid, on receipt of 25 cents to cover postage. Inclose stamp for reply, and address

MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD,

Healing Medium,

Has been before the public as a successful Healer the past fifteen years. We rely entirely on the controling influences. We diagnose and give prescriptions by letter. Distance no objection. Will visit in persons reasonable distance those that desire, and can afford the expense. Delineation and advice in a variety of ways. Examinations are given gratuitously to all our patients, when presented by our guides. Our former custom has been to come en rapport with the applicant by the hand-writing or lock of hair; but to save time, and the unpleasant sensation of taking on the symptoms of the disease, we require the applicant to give age and sex, with one or two leading symptoms of the disease, written by the patient, if able to write—if not, send lock of hair. As the giving of tests is not the object which we seek, but to restore the patient to health by Nature's own hand, in the shortest time possible, we do not deem it necessary here to lumber up an advertisement with what we have done or what we can do, but prefer to be known by our fruits.

Terms, for diagnosis and prescription, $2; Diagnosis without prescription, $1; all subsequent prescriptions, $1 each. All letters should be accompanied with the fee, and addressed to MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD, Box 15, Lake Mills, Jefferson Co., Wis.

[PAUL and JUDAS Entering the Cave of JOHN THE BAPTIST.]

JESUS OF NAZARETH,

BY

PAUL AND JUDAS.

Through Alexander Smyth, Medium.

This work has been read with intense interest by thousands, and is universally pronounced the most in the whole line of Spiritualistic Literature. It is the only true and reliable history of the remarkable medium called Jesus, ever written. After waiting eighteen hundred years, PAUL and JUDAS, finding the time propitious, and an excellent medium through whom to communicate, have given to the world a book of lasting interest, by taking possession of Mr. Smyth about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well-connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was, probably, no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed, that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end, and contains 319 closely-printed pages.

PRICE, $1.50; postage, 20 cents.

GREAT INDUCEMENTS OFFERED TO AGENTS

Having been Western Agent for Orton's Patent Preparation for the past year, I have had my good opinion of said Preparation fully confirmed by the most indubitable testimony from nearly every state in the Union, and believing it to be one of the greatest discoveries of the day, calculated to do untold good, and to have an immense sale as its merits become known, I have made a contract with the owner of the patent, whereby I have the exclusive control of the article throughout the territory of the United States, and I desire to secure in each state and territory (except the states of Illinois and Maine) an active, reliable man or company, with a capital of $1,000 or more, to take the exclusive control of the sale of the Preparation in their respective states. I make very liberal arrangements with such parties.

Parties desiring an honorable and profitable business, or to increase an already established business, and who can fill the bill, are invited to correspond with the undersigned.

TERMS OF THE

Religio-Philosophical Journal.

$3,00 per year, $1,50—6 months, $1,—4mo.

☞ Fifty Cents for Three Months on trial TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or POST-OFFICE MONEY ORDER, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to FIFTEEN CENTS, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3.50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names RETAINED on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the coming year, with or without further reminder from this office

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if Smith J. is paid to Dec. 10th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith J.—10 Dec.—0." The 0 means 1870. If he has only paid to Dec. 10th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—10 Dec.—9, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as 70 for 1870, or 69 for 1869.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL, should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

In the article that preceded this, we alluded to accidents that were constantly occurring in the regions of space, and referred to a world that had been wrecked, which was located in the region of the constellation Andromeda, and in this we desire to still further pursue that train of thought. To the children of earth, unaccustomed to consider imperfection outside of their immediate surroundings, the position we assumed, will be regarded with a certain degree of doubt. The idea of a huge blazing orb in the distant firmament,—a wreck of a world, sending forth jets of fire for thousands of miles, will be regarded as preposterous by many,—yet, nevertheless true. The denizens of earth, confined to its surface, compelled to linger there for a certain period, have been accustomed to believe that imperfections only surrounded them, but that in the star-lit dome of the vast universe, perfection, queen-like, ruled; and no mistakes were made in the grand improvements constantly being inaugurated. Tell the children of earth, that in the regions of space, where the star dust glistens, and where spirits with towering intellects reside, there is imperfection, marring all the works of creation, and they will laugh at you, and tell you that "God is the author thereof, and all the works of his hand are perfect." But, as our vision sweeps the horizon, and our mind grasps the action of forces there, we observe nothing but imperfection, and disasters are constantly occurring. The British Quarterly Review contains a graphic account of a conflagration in the heavens. It says that, "On the 12th of May, 1866, a great conflagration, infinitely larger than London or Moscow, was announced. To use the expression of a distinguished astronomer, a world was found to be on fire. A star, which till then had shown meekly and unobtrusively in the Corona Borealis, suddenly blazed up into a luminary of the second magnitude. In course of three days from its discovery in this new character by Mr. Birmingham, at Tuam, it had declined to the third or even to the fourth order of brilliancy. In twelve days, dating from its first appearition in the Irish heavens, it had sunk to the eighth rank, and it went on waning until the 26 h of June, when it ceased to be discernable except through the medium of the telescope. This was a remarkable, though not an unprecedented proceeding on the part of a star; but one singular circumstance in its behavior was, that after the lapse of nearly two months, it began to blaze up again, though not with equal ardor, and after maintaining its glow for a few weeks, and passing through sundry phases of color, it gradually paled its fire and returned to its former insignificance:

"How many years have elapsed since this awful conflagration actually took place it would be presumptious to guess, but it must be remembered that news from the heavens, though carried by the fleetest of messengers—light, reaches us long after the event has transpired, and that the same celestial courier is still dropping the tidings at each station it reaches in space, until it sinks exhausted by the length of its flight. Now when this comet was examined, as was promptly and largely done by Professor Miller and Mr. Huggins, they found to their great wonder that it yielded two spectra—the one imposed upon the other, though obviously independent. There was the prismatic ribbon crossed by dark lines, which belongs to the sun and stars generally, but there was another in which four bright lines figured; and these, according to the canons of interpretation previously mentioned, indicated that some luminous gas (or gases) was also pouring out its light from the surface of the orb.

"Two of the lines spelled out hydrogen in the spectral language. What the other two signified did not then appear; but, inasmuch as those four streaks were brighter than the rest of the spectrum, the source from which they came must obviously have been more intensely heated than the underlying parts of photosphere, from which the normal stellar light proceeded. And, as the star suddenly flamed up, was it not a natural supposition that it had been enwrapped in burning hydrogen, which, in consequence of some great convulsion, had been liberated in prodigious quantities, and then, combining with other elements, had set this hapless world on fire? In such a fierce conflagration, the combustible gas would soon be consumed, and the glow would, therefore, begin to decline, subject, as in this case, to a second eruption, which occasioned the renewed outburst of light on the 30 h.

"By such a catastrophe, it is not wholly impossible that our own globe may sometime be ravaged, for if a word from any one who can control the elements, were to unloose for a few moments the bonds of affinity which unite the elements of water:—if the ocean on the land and the moisture in the air—a single spark would bring them together with a fury which would kindle the funeral pyre of the human race, and be fatal to the planet and all the works that are therein. It can not but be a startling fact for us that in yonder deemed and distant world we have, probably, seen in our own day, a realization of the fearful picture sketched by Peter, 'when the heavens (or atmosphere) being on fire shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat.' And if we regard it as the center of a system, it is impossible to think of the horror of the fate of the numerous globes around it when overwhelmed by this sudden deluge of light and caloric."

That man whose knowledge only extends far enough to enable him to attend successfully to the cultivation of a farm, and who knows nothing of astronomy or the principles of mathematics, will be inclined to regard the position we assume as the height of absurdity, and will say, "Away with such nonsense! What evidence have you that God did not create the worlds of space?" Well, what evidence have you that he did?

Now, man must be able to create that which he perfectly understands. To assert to the contrary would be foolish in the extreme. True, a man may comprehend the action of an engine or watch in all its parts, and yet not be able to construct one. With a full understanding, however, of any intricate machine, requisite skill is necessary; but skill is secondary; a full understanding of the nature of anything, is the primary consideration. Now, the skill to execute must naturally follow that which man understands, or progression must cease there. With an Infinite God there could be no failures, no mistakes; but we have the most indubitable evidence that accidents have occurred in the regions of space; that a world has been wrecked by some unforeseen accident, which shows conclusively that an Infinite God had nothing to do therewith. Now, if "knowledge is power," can you demonstrate that man's power must be limited to works less than the creation of worlds? Is the measure of man's capacities confined to calculations? Now, in calculation, there is manifested intellectual power, and whenever the conclusions are correct, in all cases there is embodied within the organization an inherent physical power to embody them in tangible shape! Intellectual power plans, but physical power executes. One just equals the other. But intellectual power always precedes physical power. What you are able to understand to-day, thoroughly comprehend in all its details, you may not have the physical power to execute for millions of years, but you will sometime.

Not many years ago, as the human mind was surveying the machinery of the heavens, and studying the mechanism thereof, it became greatly puzzled over certain perturbations that occurred, which could not be explained on any other hypothesis than that they were caused by the existence of a planet between Mars and Jupiter. Here was a new field for astronomers; and they vied with each other in their efforts to disclose the whereabouts of the mysterious messenger that proved of so much annoyance to mathematicians in their calculations. As early as in the beginning of the 17th century, Kepler, then in the zenith of his glory, whose mediumistic nature had impressed thereon mystical numbers and strange analogies, came to the conclusion, that between Mars and Jupiter, exercising an unseen influence, was a planet Nearly 200 years elapsed before his predictions were realized. Mitchel gives an account of the discovery of this planet in the following language:

"The discovery of a planet beyond the orbit of Saturn, by Sir William Herschel, in 1781, greatly strengthened the opinions based on the orderly arrangement of the interplanetary spaces; and the German astronomer, Bode, by the discovery of a curious relation, which seemed to control the distances of the planets, gave additional force and power to the conjecture of Kepler. This law is a very remarkable one, and although no explanation could be given of it, was verified in so many instances, as almost to force one to the conclusion that it must be a law of nature. We present the law in a simple form. Write the series—

add	4	4	4	4	4	4	4, &c.
sum	4	7	10	16	28	52	100, &c.

"Now, if ten be taken to represent the distance of the earth from the sun, the other terms of the series will represent with considerable truth the distances of the other planets, as we will readily perceive, thus—

Mercury.	Venus.	Earth.	Mars.	Jupiter.	Saturn.	Uranus.
4	7	10	16	28	52	100	196

The true distances are roughly as under:—

3.8 7.2 10 15.2 52 95.3 191.8

"It is thus seen that the actual distances of the planets agree in a most remarkable manner with those obtained by the application of Bode's Law, and as no planet was yet known to fill the distance (28) between Mars and Jupiter, it required very little devotion to the analogies of nature to create in any mind a firm belief in the existence of an unknown planet.

"The German astronomers, at the close of the last century, took up the matter with earnest enthusiasm, and in the year 1800 a congress or convention of astronomers was assembled at Lilienthal, of which M. Shroeter was elected president, and Baron De Zach perpetual secretary. It was agreed to commence a systematic search for the unknown planet, by dividing the belt of the heavens near the sun's path, called the zodiac (and within whose limits all the planetary orbits are confined), among twenty-four astronomers, who with their telescopes should search for the object in question.

"It was manifest that the unknown planet must be very small, too small to be visible to the naked eye, otherwise its discovery must have been long since accomplished. It might, however, prove to be large enough to exhibit a planetary disk in the telescope, in which event a simple search was all that was required. If, however, it should be too diminutive to show a well-defined disk in the telescope, then another method of examination would be required. The planet could only be detected by its motion among the fixed stars. This, indeed, is the way in which all the old planets had been discovered; but while the naked eye takes in at the same time a large portion of the celestial sphere, the telescope is extremely limited in its field of view, rendering the search laborious and difficult.

"Were it possible, however, to make an exact chart of all the stars in a given region of the heavens, to-night, if an examination on to-morrow night of the same region should show a strange star among those already charted, this stranger might with some probability be assumed to be a planet.

"A few hours of patient watching would show whether it was in motion, and a few nights of observation would reveal its rate of motion.

"Such was the mode of research adopted by the society of planet-hunters. The system thus adopted had not been pursued but a few months when a most signal success crowned the effort. On the night of the 1st January, 1801, Piazzi, of Palermo, in Sicily, observed a star in the constellation Taurus, which he suspected to be a stranger. On the following night (having fixed its position anew with reference to the surrounding stars), he found it had changed its place by an amount so large that its real motion could not be doubted. The star was found to be retrograding, or moving backward, and this continued up to the 12th January, when it became stationary. It was soon after lost in the rays of the sun, thus becoming invisible, before any considerable portion of its orbit had been observed, and before Piazzi could communicate his discovery to any member of the society.

"Piazzi, not considering it possible that a planet which had remained hidden from mortal vision from its creation could be discovered with so little effort as had thus far been put forth, conceived that the moving body which he had discovered was a comet, but the intelligence having been communicated to the society, Bode promptly pronounced this to be the long sought planet, an opinion in which he was sustained by Olbers and Buckhardt, Baron De Zach, and Gauss, and I know not by how many other members of the society.

"It now became a matter of the deepest interest to re-discover this stranger after its emergence from the sun's rays, a task of no little difficulty, as we will see by the slightest reflection. The star had been followed through only about 2° of its orbit, and on such a slender basis it seemed almost impossible to erect a superstructure such as might conduct the astronomer to the point occupied at any given time by this almost invisible world. We shall see hereafter that this most astonishing feat was successfully accomplished by the German mathematician and astronomer, Gauss, then quite a young man, and who, in this early effort, gave evidence of that high ability for which he became afterward so greatly distinguished.

"Ceres being re-discovered, and closely observed, the data were soon obtained for the exact computation of the elements of its orbit, when it was found to occupy, in the planetary system, the precise position which had been assigned to it fifteen years before by Baron De Zach, in accordance with the indications of the curious empirical rule, already presented, known as Bode's Law.

"The harmony of the system was thus fully established; the missing term in the series was now filled. The vast interplanetary space between Mars and Jupiter was the real locality of a discovered world, whose existence had been conjectured by Kepler two hundred years before, and whose discovery, by combined systematic and scientific examination, constituted the crowning glory of the age. True, the new planet was exceedingly small when compared with any of the old planets. Yet it acknowledged obedience to the great law established by Kepler, revolving in an elliptical orbit of very considerable eccentricity, and sweeping round the sun in a period of about four years and nine months, and at a mean distance of about 263 millions of miles.

Thus we find that the human mind is ever on the alert, and for two hundred years, it gazed heavenward before it had the pleasure of finding Ceres. But we tell you, that by and by, man shall have power to execute, to unfold, to create all things the nature of which he fully understands. We have no need of an Infinite God. Such a being has no existence.

To Our Readers.

The Spring, which is dawning so auspiciously, seems to portend the opening of a year that will be crowned with a weighty, golden harvest ere its close. The truths of Spiritualism are growing upon the people in keeping with the harmonious elements, throwing the beautiful light of its golden face into every nook and corner in the land. Where its opposers are strongest, there are the manifestations best. At Milan, Ohio, spirit pictures are appearing on the windows of the churches and in the houses of the deacons. In Maine, a medium was invited by a number of church-members to hold a circle for their especial benefit, in order that they might "expose" the matter. The result was, that eighteen of them became convinced of the truths of Spiritualism ere the evening had passed. It is springing up everywhere in the churches—it is growing stronger every day in the hearts of the people. In this view of the case, it behooves every Spiritualist to make an effort to keep the ball rolling. And in no way can this be better done than by spreading the spiritual literature. Buy the books and tracts, and send them around among your neighbors. Many will read who will not attend a seance or lecture. Support our mediums by every means in your power.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, the firm and especial friend of all true mediums, the fearless exponent of all the iconoclastic ideas of the age, the standard-bearer of the truths of the Harmonial Philosophy, and the uncompromising opposer of error in every form, also claims a large share of your attention. It is your duty to circulate its angel-born pages everywhere. Now let each and every reader of the JOURNAL accept this as a personal appeal to him or herself to send us at least one new subscriber. Many can send more, with a little effort on their part. We would again urge you, friends, to respond to this call, and ere the golden harvest is gathered, Spiritualism will be felt to be a mighty power in the land.

To those who have already sent us many new subscribers with which to commence the TENTH volume, and who are now inducing others to take the JOURNAL on trial, we tender our sincere thanks.

Another—The 999th Orthodox Expose of the Davenports.

The following must be delicious for the opposers of Spiritualism, as well as to that class of Spiritualists who condemn all physical manifestations:

Exposes of the Davenports have been so often repeated, like other theological lies, they may be registered as orthodox. Scarcely a month has passed for the last fifteen years, but the calumnies of the secular and religious press have teemed with new exposes of those most excellent mediums. But never have we seen so shallow a pretense for an expose as this last. The hundreds of thousands who have witnessed the manifestations in their presence, will, if honest, set the seal of falsehood upon "the Knoxville correspondent of the Chattanooga Times.

The correspondent evidently, never even attended one of the Davenport seances. It is got up for a sensational article, knowing full well that the opposers of Physical manifestations among Spiritualists, and all other opposers of Spiritualism, would seize upon it and herald it through newspapers, and mouth it about from one end of the country to the other, as a delicious morsel not to be lost in the great work of uprooting Modern Spiritualism and converting the world to theology.

That all of our readers may know the precise nature of the last great expose, we copy the article entire, and say to every reader of this article, if you have never witnessed the Davenport manifestations, do so the very first opportunity you have, and you will find the "masked paper hand," "long pole," and "dark lantern" theory, as flimsy and destitute of truth as the dogmas of old theology:

THE DAVENPORT BROTHERS EXPOSED.

Hoxie's Hall was filled to overflowing. At the proper time, Mr. Fay, one of the performers, advanced to the front of the stage with the names of the committee, and requested them to come forward. Messrs. Bell and Lowry soon made their way through the hall, and were greeted with tremendous applause as they bowed to the audience. Ropes were given to these men, they examined them thoroughly, and then went at work with a vim to tie the Brothers tight.

This being done, they explained to the audience how many knots, etc., they had made, and, in their opinion, all was satisfactory. The cabinet windows were closed by Professor Fay, and in eight ten seconds, sounds from a violin, tambourine and guitar were heard distinctly by the audiences, as coming from the cabinet. The doors were opened by the Professor, and the committee, after an examination, found the ropes and knots the same as they had tied. While closing the door, Mr. Bell was struck on the shoulder with some unknown object, but Mr. Lowry saw it, and instantly went to Mr. Bell's side, and whispered to Mr. Bell, who began to go through the same motion. Out came the object. Mr. Lowry sprang like a cat and seized the hand, and wrenched it carefully off, throwing it in the audience. Upon examination, it was found to be a paper masked hand, as thin as writing paper, and fitting so closely to the cabinet that it was impossible to observe it. It was worked by wires perfectly at the will of the operators.

Cheer upon cheer was given for the committee. The Brothers were raging with madness, but constant calls from the audience convinced them that they must either play or pay, and accordingly the cabinet was thrown aside and the dark-scene was announced. The Professor stated before hand if any tricks were attempted, he should not proceed with the entertainment.

A table was brought forward and several musical instruments laid upon it, and the Professor and one of the Brothers were tied, a quantity of phosphorus was rubbed on a guitar, and the lights were extinguished. Total darkness reigned. Presently sweet chords came from the guitar, and the phosphorus was seen running here and there in the air. All present were thunder struck. All believed the guitar sailing here and there—they might catch the cabinet trick—but the dark seance was a stunner. While the supposed guitar was swinging in the air, one of the audience named Brooks, pulled from under his coat a dark lantern of immense power, which he instantly shot on the flying guitar, and to all present it appeared, nothing, only one of the attaches of the show held a pole six feet long, on the end of which was stuck a small piece of a flour barrel heading. The guitar was lying on the table in the same position, only the phosphorus was not on it.

To describe the scene that followed would be folly. Mr. Bell then stated that their cabinet tricks were done by simply bringing their tied hands over their head, and then they were almost free to ring bells, throw horns, etc., etc. We don't think the Brothers will book this city on their next route.—Knoxville Correspondent Chattanooga Times.

Wonderful Spirit Manifestations in Moravia, N. Y.

The following is an extract from a private letter written by E. Tallmadge. Before publishing it, we wrote to a highly esteemed friend, a lady residing in Moravia, New York, to ascertain about the truthfulness of the report.

Mr. Tallmadge says:

BROTHER JONES:—A lady resides in Moravia, New York, whose house is thronged with anxious inquirers, who are searching after the truth, and they are amply repaid for their trouble, for they can see their friends face to face and talk with them. First, hands and arms are seen, then the face, as plain and positive and identical as when living in the body.

Now, then, this settles the matter in regard to Modern Spiritualism. We earnestly recommend this medium, to the great Reverend Mr. Burr, who went through this part of the country, exposing Spiritualism for the small sum of twelve cents per head, with full houses of church-members and the clergy,—snapping his toe joints for spirit-rapping, and ringing bells under the the table with his feet. These orthodox folks who know so much of the humbug and fallacy of Spiritualism must try once more.

E. TALLMADGE.

Addison, N. Y.

Mrs. N. J. Marshall in reply to our letter of inquiry, says:

BROTHER JONES:—The reason I have not answered your letter ere this, is that I have been away from home to hear E. V. Wilson lecture. And yesterday I went to Keeler's to see the spirit manifestations, so that I could write you what I had seen, not what I had heard others say they had seen. Mr. Tallmadge has not had a wrong representation concerning spirit manifestations.

While sitting in what they call the spirit-room, lighted by a lamp, I saw the hand of a lady, with a diamond ring on one of the fingers. Dr. Moore, from Syracuse, thought he recognized the hand. He asked if it was the hand of his wife. She answered by waving her hand back and forth three times. She then took on a form and was plainly to be seen as far down as the waist. Mr. Moore recognized her. She said to him, "It is your dear Mary."

Should any one doubt what I have written, they can refer to Mr. Dempster Moore, of Syracuse.

The next I saw was what appeared to be a person's head, with a veil thrown over it. It was covered with something that sparkled like diamonds; it looked very beautiful. I hope they may be able to show the same to others, for I assure you it was a pleasing sight.

Next, three hands were to be seen at one time. We saw several spirit forms. They were all recognized but two. One took on form, and held it ten minutes and talked to us during his stay; gave his name as Henry Cook. He said there were many spirits present that would be glad to talk with their friends, but had not strength. Two years ago spirits commenced showing hands and faces, but could not hold the form more than an instant,—would come and go like a flash. We can see great progress in this short time. Mrs. W. W. Alley, of Moravia, has seen more of spirit manifestations than I have. She has seen them. She has also shook hands and talked with them all at the same time. She has seen a spirit holding a rose in her hand, and another spirit holding a bouquet of flowers. We have heard them play on the piano and on different kinds of instruments. I think they have had more manifestations at Mr. Keeler's than they are having at present. I think they would get wonderful things did they manage rightly. MRS. N. J. MARSHALL.

Moravia, N. Y., March 2d, 1871.

The Crucible.

The above is the title of a new paper, the first number of which has just reached us, hailing from Baltimore, Md. It is a pleasant-looking little paper, edited by Moses Hull, W. F. Jamieson and D. W. Hull. Moses Hull, in the leading editorial, under the head of "Greeting," says:

Once more we are called upon, under, in some respects, more favorable conditions than ever before, to take the "chair editorial"—to pilot a new ship, laden with "goods and chattels" for thousands of needy souls through the breakers and against the head winds, to a safe harbor. Whether we shall succeed in making time in our regular weekly trips may depend somewhat on the interest taken in our enterprise by those for whom we work. We shall, from week to week, have freight enough offered to weigh down several such vessels as ours. We shall call, each week selecting such matter as we shall decide will be of the most service to our readers.

Dropping the above illustration, we have not carelessly, thoughtlessly, nor yet heedlessly entered this arena. We know the perils incident to our undertaking. It is not to our interest now, even though our barque is launched, to disguise facts. We know the depth of our own pocket; we know the present financial strength of our company. We also know the expense of publishing a paper. We do not expect smooth sailing; on the contrary, we expect hard work and poor pay. Financially it will embarrass us, yet we shall steer clear.

The Cosmopolitan Publishing Company was not formed to work against other companies, nor is the Crucible started because the other papers engaged in heralding the reforms of the day are remiss or inefficient in their duties, yet we see a gap, and hear a voice, "Stand ye in the way, make up the hedge." There is room for all. Look at the two-and-one papers devoted to the various reforms of the day—each holding the veil of superstition before the eyes of those who need the light! Our Company asked, can we wield a counter influence? Can we dispell the mists and fogs which serve to keep the sun of truth from enlightening the multitudes? At least we will try. We have put our shoulders to the wheel, and believe our readers, in the present number of the Crucible, is the beginning of the result.

Not many words need be said with regard to our intentions; all we need now say, is that we intend to make a paper that shall be thoroughly alive to all the reforms of the day. We shall ignore no truth or person on account of unpopularity. We shall not strive to make a popular, but a thoughtful, a truthful journal. We shall not attempt to make a story paper; those wishing stories are recommended to the Dime Novels or the New York Ledger.

Making due allowance for the casualties always attending getting out the first number of a paper, especially when attended with the additional labor and perplexities of moving, fitting up a printing office, preaching, and other etcetcras attendant upon changing base of operation, the reader is permitted to take this number as a sample of what the Crucible will probably be; yet we hope to improve every number. Excelsior is our motto.

Now that we are safely launched, and under full sail, blessing the angels in and out of the form who have assisted us thus far, and invoking future blessings, spiritual and temporal, from all worlds, permit us to record our determination to make a paper worthy of going into every family. MOSES HULL.

We hope our brethren will more than realize their highest expectations. There is room enough for all.

The Journal.

As usual, this number of the JOURNAL is filled to overflowing with the best of everything in the way of spiritual literature. On the first page will be found a lecture by Emma Hardinge, always full of interest. On the second page, "Mediumship of A. J. Davis," by J. L. Potter; 'Cures by Spirits," by Wm. B. Fahnestock; "Strictures on the 'Search After God,'" by Geo. White; Letters from Mrs. Wilcoxson and Dumont C. Dake, etc. On the third page, the conclusion of the chapter on the "Hollow Globe," by Wm. F. Lyon; On the fourth page, the continuation of the "Search after God," and the usual editorials. On the fifth page, we are favored with an article of unusual interest, Brother Child, in his department. On the sixth page, the conclusion of the very interesting festations at Brinkley College, Memphis. Brother Wilson's department is occupied this week with a report of the discussion between himself and Rev. Clark Braden.

C. Punderson,

We received $9 00 from you on your subscription some time ago. You failed to state where your paper was going. Have written you at the place your letter was dated, and it comes back uncalled for. Please advise us.

Letter of Fellowship.

On the 23rd ult., the Religio-Philosophical Society granted a Letter of Fellowship to Prof. Wm. F. Lyon, of Sacramento, Cal., legally constituting him "a regular minister of the gospel," empowering him to solemnize marriages, etc.

Thomas S. A. Pope.

The above named brother, now located at Mound City, Kansas, received from the Religio-Philosophical Society, letters of fellowship, constituting him in law, a regular minister of the gospel, which authorizes him to solemnize marriages, etc.

Black List.

Certain parties having made payment of dues their names have been removed from so conspicuous a position. It is well. Better yet to have made payments when the paper was ordered to be discontinued!

Personal and Local.

—Harry Bastian, the physical medium, has been meeting with fine success in his travels through Illinois and Iowa. Letters of commendation have been received by us almost daily. He expects to return to Chicago in a few weeks. He intends holding a few seances here, preparatory to his return East. We hope such a reception will be given him by his friends as will induce him to prolong his visit.

—Julia B. Dickinson, of Fitchburg, Mass., is a very fine medical clairvoyant. She is traveling through Vermont and Massachusetts, at present, healing the sick and lecturing as occasion offers. Such pioneer labor should be encouraged by all.

—Carrie S. Kilburn writes from Manhattan, Kansas: "I am an inspirational and healing medium, though not yet fully developed, and think that if the time has come that mediums are to be imprisoned for exercising their God given faculties, it is time we put on our armor, and prepare to meet the enemies of our liberty!"

—The Spiritualists of Grass Valley, have leased the old Methodist Church, South, are repairing the same, and will hold their religious meetings here after in that building.

—Victor Emanuel and Prince Hubert have both become converts to Spiritualism. The Kluxism is developing rapidly into a medium.

—D. W. Hull speaks in Providence during March; in Corry, Penn., during April; Wyandotte, Michigan, April 30 and May 7; Hobart, Indiana, May 26-29. Those wishing Mr. Hull's services on his way to the West, during May, should address him during March, care of P. Hacker, Providence, Rhode Island.

—Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson, who is now giving lectures at Louisville, Ky., reports an increased interest in the Spiritual Philosophy in that enterprising city.

—Mrs. Mary Lanston Strong is lecturing in Cincinnati this month. Her address is 70 Jefferson street, Dayton, Ohio.

—Our readers wanting carriages or wagons, will do well to correspond with N. Kinney, Esq., whose advertisement appears in another column. He is, we believe, an honest, upright business man, and always gives satisfaction.

—Lavinia F. Ingalls, writing from North Branch, Minnesota, says: "If any of our spiritual friends, while Chicago's sultry days are on hand, wish to breathe our Minnesota air, they will find with us a pleasant healthy spot, to recuperate exhausted energies. We are about one and a half miles from St. Paul."

—Mrs. Amelia S. Gould, of Bangor, Me., is traveling through that state, lecturing, holding seances, giving tests, etc. She will also solicit subscriptions for the JOURNAL. We understand she is a very fine medium, and very deserving of encouragement.

—That thrilling theological romance, "Exeter Hall," is attracting the attention which it so well deserves. We know of no better eye opener to those of our fellow-man who are still fettered with the galling chains of old orthodoxy.

TRUE FRIENDSHIP.

BY M. L. B.

There are gems as bright as the stars of night
Which flash like a jewelled crown,
There are beauties rare, like the pearls so fair,
Lying deep in the ocean down.

There are diamonds, rubies, and links of gold
Entwined in the mystic chain,
Which around us thrown, with ourselves has grown
Over every joy and pain;

The chain which is binding each to each,
Till our hands are linked as one,
And our hearts commune in a blooming June,
'Neath the light of a lasting sun.

Tho' distance lie 'neath our own blue sky,
Which spreadeth o'er leagues of space,
When we hear no sound, save the murmuring round
Of the winds which blow apace;

Though there roll between with a change of scene
The waters whose waves must sweep—
The tears which rise in the loved one's eyes,
As they mourn for those who sleep—

None can forget us. We cannot forget,
Thanks, thanks to the God of mind,
The chain is strong, and its beauty long
Must rest with human kind.

Thy words, thy smiles are the wealth of isles
Far out in the human sea,
And I wear the gem as a diadem
That thy friendship sent to me.

Narrative of a Dark Spirit—From the Infernal Regions.

NUMBER ONE.

During the past winter we have been thrown, by peculiar circumstances into association with this spirit; who, as will be perceived by his own story, has been controlling an innocent young woman for many years, producing violent convulsions and causing her to use the most profane and obscene language when under his influence, although a very beautiful, pure and intelligent child. It is not necessary that we should dwell upon the minute particulars which brought us into relation with this spirit.

Suffice it to say that Mrs. Yeaw, whose mediumship is of the very highest character, was the first to describe the causes that produced the trouble, and at the suggestions given through her, means were taken, which, we trust, will result in the cure of the patient, as well as the restoration of this poor benighted victim of crime, to a condition in which the ways of progress can shall be opened to him and deliverance from the chains of a most terrible bondage be brought about. When we first saw him, he was accompanied by two other spirits; they had heavy black covers apparently like thick cloth, which were thrown over their heads and bodies, so that only their lower limbs could be seen. At times they would raise these covers and present hideous, ghastly, grinning faces.

At first this one, who appeared to be the leader, was very shy. We spoke to him, but he took no notice of it, except that he ran away, howling fearfully, into a strange, black looking place, somewhat like the hold of a great steamship where the furnaces were replaced under the boilers. There was no fire here; the places seemed to be ranged like ovens with strong iron doors, which were fastened by bars. Into one of these oven-like places, in which there was neither room to sit or stand, we saw this black spirit go, and another evil one closed the door and barred it firmly; it seemed as though this was done to protect this wretched being. We spoke to the spirit who had fastened the door, and said we desired to have some conversation with that spirit. He replied, "You can't do that here, but I will open the door and let you look in." He did so, and we looked in and saw in this black and hideous place the flashing fire of the eyes and the wild, grinning face of this miserable being. We said to him, "Brother, this is not a suitable place for any one to dwell in. Why do you go there?" He made no reply but with a wild and dreadful howl, turned his face from us and covered it with the black cloth. We did not feel in the least alarmed, and we were determined to pursue our investigations of this matter, dreadful as it seemed to be.

Turning to the spirits who has charge of these, we stated our desire to speak with this spirit. "You can't do it here," said he, "but I think I can persuade him to meet you, if you are willing to meet him alone and allow him to be covered with his black mantle."

We consented to this, and a few days afterwards we saw him alone; we asked him in the kindest manner if he knew what he was doing. At first he made no reply, but in a short time, finding we were persistent in our efforts, addressed us in very profane language, but consented to hear what we had to say. We said kindly but positively, "Brother, we know you are in human form, though you can scarcely realize this yourself now, and we know too that there is a better condition for you. You know that you are not doing the best you can under the circumstances, and consequently you are adding to your sufferings, which are greater than you feel that you are able to bear. You are doing evil to yourself and to those around you, and it is the evil you are doing to a poor victim on earth that has brought us to you, to do all we can to relieve her and you also." He listened for a moment and then raising his thick cover, we caught his eye, and even amid the demoniacal fires that flashed out there, by a most positive effort of our will we caused him to quail and in a moment we saw that there was something human there, the victory was ours, we knew that look would yet be divine. We continued thus: "There are means by which you can be released from this terrible hell of torment and remorse into which you have plunged, but first of all you must cease to do evil, to do this you must find new associates and different surroundings and if possible cast off all the past. If you will resolve to do this we can help you now. We know you are really tired of this terrible life you have been leading, and have said in your soul, 'oh that I could escape from this bondage of sin,' and then your hope has failed you, and you have said, 'there is no chance for that, I have lived so long in these infernal regions, and been engaged in the practice of these evils so long, that I fear I can never change.'"

All this time we had been alone, just then there approached a bright and beautiful spirit, whom we perceived and recognized, as Samuel Livezey, formerly a minister in the society of friends. Our benighted Brother was not at all conscious of his presence, or he would have fled. We said to him "Brother, there are influences on earth and in spirit-life, that will help you if you are willing to do your part. We shall be glad to help you, and here is a spirit who feels a deep interest in you, also, and who will aid us in the good work. He has been attracted to us now. Joseph, for this we learned was the name of our benighted brother, did not see or hear the spirit, but he was becoming interested in what we said and beginning to feel that perhaps there might be some truth in it, he felt as he remarked to us that nothing could be worse than his condition, and therefore, without much hope, he would make the effort to do whatever we told him. Assuring Joseph that this spirit friend, and another who had now come, would take him to a better place than any he had ever found since he left the earth form, and that he could soon return to us, and report what they were doing for him, he threw away the black cover or mantle, and went with them. This interview caused us intense suffering, physically and mentally, indeed it was several hours before we were relieved. Two weeks passed away, and we saw our friend at a distance in company with several other spirits, who had been giving him aid and instruction. He seemed desirous to return to us, but when they told him it was not time yet, we were pleased to notice that he yielded to their advice. At the end of another week, he came and we had a short interview; it was not necessary for us to come into very close rapport with him at this time. He was informed that in a short time he should come to us, and give a full narrative of his life on earth, and in the spheres which seemed to gratify him very much, for he had a feeling very common to spirits, that this is necessary in order that they may progress.

We shall print in this narrative in succeeding articles. It was one of the most thrilling that we have ever received.

True religion is man's consciousness of God; theology is man's theory of him.

Every human being is a page in the living Bible; an immortal reality; a testimony in favor of the love of God.—Ibid.

The divinity of truth is not dependent upon the place in which it is recorded; wherever a man finds it, there God has written it.

SEA WEEDS.

"Oh, call us not weeds! We are flowers of the sea;
For lovely, and gay, and bright-tinted are we;
Not reared like the beds of a summer parterre,
Where winds are but sighs on the evening air;
Our exquisite, fragile and delicate forms
Are nursed by the ocean and rocked by the storms."

Evil be to him that evil thinketh. Pure thoughts and aspirations are the rounds in the ladder of eternal progress.

Of all we know and loved of thee,
But lives in holier beauty now,
Baptized in immortality.

This life of mortal breath
Is but the suburbs of the life elysian,
Whose portals we call death."

Epithalium.

On March 18th, 1871,
I joined Maggie Gyer to L. G. Stone,
On South Clark street, 392,
At Mrs. Smith's, amidst a few.
Hard though it looks, the deed is done,
And Maggie fair is turned to Stone;
But love can change a stone to flesh,
And she looked ruddy, fair and fresh;
And I have read of living stones,
And these have eyes, and flesh and bones,
And some are white, with names of love,
Inscribed by him who rules above.
And may this couple live so pure,
As of these white stones to be sure.
May joys on earth and joys in heaven
Be won and unto them be given,
By living as God's pure will,
So prays for them S. Underhill.

Obituary.

Another standard-bearer of the truth of Spiritual love has laid off the mortal and encased in the pearly robe of the spiritual, passed on to the Summer Land from La Porte, Indiana. Mrs. Julia Brown, aged 18 years. Her happy spirit shed its lustre in the lyceum, breathing out mutual love in its highest, purest notes. And even on her dying bed, when racked with pain she still sang: "I'm going home to die no more."

The funeral services were held in the Swedenborgian Temple, which was filled to its utmost with the friends who knew her best, and loved her most. The children, whose faces pale with grief told how well they loved her, sang two beautiful songs. Dr. Blair, of Chicago, delivered a short eulogy, and described the spirit as he saw it leaning on the husband's breast.

Mr. Warren Cochran, her noble brother at the grave read Lizzie Doten's inspired poem, "I still live," in a manner that proved to all that he knew she still lived.

A Quarterly Meeting of the Southern Wisconsin Spiritual Association will be held at the village of Waukesha, on Saturday and Sunday, April 8th and 9th, 1871. Eminent speakers will be present, and all are cordially invited to attend. Come to our "feast of reason and flow of soul." Come to the banquet of the spheres celestial and mundane. By order of Executive Committee. D. P. Balcom, } Pres't. }

SPEAKERS' AND MASS CONVENTION.

As Chairman of the Committee appointed by the Northwestern Speakers' Association, I am requested to call a Speakers' and Mass Convention, to be held at Smith's Opera House, Decatur, Illinois, on the 2d, 3d, and 4th days of June, 1871; to commence its first session on Friday, June 2d, at 10 o'clock A. M.; and to continue them for the three days as directed by the Convention.

This Association has commenced a series of meetings to gradually change the good social conventions that have found many good homes for worn, wearied, and sick mediums and speakers, to good social science conventions, to establish the rules by which all faithful workers in the cause of truth will receive a just support. Such progress is necessary in this transition period of religious associations, from the theological to the scientific, and from the rule of the Christian priests of earth, licensed by man, to that of the angels of heaven, through mediums licensed by the laws of God.

Our prophets and seers inform us that the Christians will not permit the peaceful triumph of mediums and scientists, but will inaugurate one of the most relentless and bloody wars that ever devastated the earth, to prevent it; that they will send their most wily spies among the people, to deceive them by lies, and will prepare worse than Andersonville prisons for mediums and their friends that fall into their hands. The Christian priesthood is the natural and deadly enemy of mediums, as is proved by their acts in all ages since the time of the Constantines, when they passed a law to murder, and confiscate the property of not only mediums, but all who consulted them, which laws have continued until very recently, when they were forced by public opinion to abandon their thirsty and have taken to the wilest falsehoods and persecutions of mediums and their friends, and when these means fail to prevent the spread of Spiritualism, and all their other fraudulent but peaceful means fail, they will resort to war.

It will be asked, what powers can they command to begin so unjust a war? First, the Christian Ring and the Whiskey Ring that at present hold the cities of the North in their power, and second the Rebel Ring and Whisky Ring that form the Ku Klux party of the South that is now engaged in a war upon every just principle and person. Whiskey cements these elements of war, and the power of this can be easily estimated when the number of these licensed grog shops is considered. Then they have learned and talented persons for leaders, and, besides, they have ruled this nation most of the time for more than thirty years before the rebellion.

Now, the question is, who are opposed to these hosts and in favor of religious and political equality? Only such as adopt the battle-cry of, "Give me liberty, or give me death." Their only wish is to be right, and to unite their councils with angels and with people, to learn what is right, and when they ought to stand in the ranks of peace or war to meet their enemies, and whether their bodies survive or perish in the conflict, they will be at their posts and do their duty.

This Convention is called to continue the progressive work of the Association, to establish the order and love of the angels in heaven, among the people of the earth.

Invitation is extended to all to be present. Those who attend will receive a cordial reception by the Spiritualists and their friends in Decatur.

Persons wishing special information about this entertainment of speakers and others, will address the Secretary of the Committee of Reception, H Righter, Box 290 Decatur, Ill.

H. S. Brown, M D., Chairman.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium,

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

Mrs. Robinson, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return's most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

If herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

Mrs. Robinson also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well when the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $2.00; each subsequent, $2.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $5; answering Business Letters, $5. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

AN EXCITING STORY!

SINGULAR AND STARTLING WORKS.

Brinkley Female College Haunted and in an uproar of Terror and Confusion.

(Concluded from last week.)

Clara Robertson, being the central figure in the story of the "Ghost of Brinkley Cottage," it was worth while, in order to satisfy the inquiries of many who desire to know the character of the person who has seen a "traveler from the undiscovered country," to apply the test of what may be called a cross examination, and to elicit from the girl's own lips what she saw, and her own belief and sources of information. This has been done, and the examination is published in full below. It is a matter of curious and interesting speculation to the metaphysical inquirer; and opens a wide field for all sorts of theories respecting the power of mind or spirit over matter. Those whose consciences are weak, and those whose intellects are not as strong as that of the girl of thirteen, are cautioned not to read the interview.

The residence of Clara Robertson is No. 261 DeSoto street. It is a modest-looking, two-story frame structure, standing back from the street, with a wooden paling in front. Ringing the door-bell, the Avalanche reporter was admitted by Mr. Robertson, father of the girl, who readily consented to an interview with his daughter, and ushered the reporter into a cozy and comfortable parlor, the striking features of which were a Brussels carpet, a piano, a centre-table, hair-cloth furniture, and pictures on the walls. In a minute or two, Miss Clara was introduced in the shape of a strikingly p[re]possessing modest-looking girl of apparently [a]bout fourteen years of age, with large, liquid blue eyes, full of expression, a highly intellectual and expressive countenance, and thick brown hair hanging loose down to her shoulders. Her dress was of blue, with a light-colored pinafore, and her whole appearance was suggestive simplicity of a bright school girl. An observer's first impression, after conversing with her awhile, is that she is intelligent and bright beyond her years, and at the same time full of simplicity, candor and truthfulness. The reporter looked closely for wildness of expression about the eyes, and apparent wandering of the mind, and tried to stagger her with questions in every way possible during the narrative, but saw and elicited nothing to cast the shadow of a doubt upon her belief of what she stated. The interview was as follows:

Reporter—Have you any objection to answering some questions concerning your experiences at Brinkley College?

Clara—None at all, sir.

Rep.—Have you read the accounts in the Avalanche, concerning the apparitions which you claim to have seen there, and were they correct?

Clara—Yes, sir; I have read them. There were some mistakes, and the whole has not been told.

Rep.—What is your age?

Clara—I am thirteen years old.

Rep.—Where were you born?

Clara—In Bolivar, Tennessee.

Rep.—How long have you resided in this neighborhood?

Clara—Between two and three years.

Rep.—Have you always been in good health?

Clara—Yes, sir; most always. I've not been sick in three years.

Rep.—How long have you attended Brinkley College?

Clara—Since the first of last September.

Rep.—Where did you attend school previously?

Clara—I went to the public school on Linden street. Miss Gussie Powell was my teacher.

Rep.—Have you been kindly treated at Brinkley College?

Clara—Very; and I like all the teachers and scholars.

Rep.—Did any one in the college ever frighten you in any way, or play tricks on you?

Clara—No, sir; never.

Rep.—Did you ever hear anything about the history of the place, or that it was haunted, from any one?

Clara—No, sir.

Rep.—Did you ever hear of a family named Davie, living there?

Clara—No, sir.

Rep.—Have you ever heard of Mr. Brinkley?

Clara—Never till Lizzie (the specter) told me of him. I only knew that the school was called Brinkley College, but I didn't know why it was so called.

Rep.—Had you ever heard of a Lizzie Davie?

Clara—Never, sir.

Rep.—Did you ever hear of treasure being concealed about the college grounds, or other strange things about the place?

Clara—No, sir.

Rep.—Were your schoolmates in the habit of talking about ghosts or haunted houses?

Clara—No, sir; and I have never read a ghost story or a novel of any kind.

Rep.—What do you read?

Clara—Beside my school books, nothing but Sunday-school books and the Bible.

Rep.—Do you believe the Bible?

Clara—Yes, sir; I was converted at a revival in Asbury Chapel last summer, and have since been a member of the Methodist Church.

Rep.—Do you know Mrs. Nourse?

Clara—Yes, sir.

Rep.—How long have you known her?

Clara—I never saw her until a week ago last Monday or Tuesday, when I met her in Pa's office.

Rep.—Had you seen the apparition at that time, and where?

Clara—I had seen it three times, and somewhere but at the college.

Rep.—Did you have any conversation with Mrs. Nourse?

Clara—Very little. She and Pa were talking about what I had seen, and she advised me to speak to the specter if I saw it again, saying it would not hurt me.

Rep.—Are you conscious of Mrs. Nourse having any influence over you?

Clara—No, sir; none at all.

Rep.—Do you know anything about mesmerism?

Clara—I have heard of it, but have never been mesmerized, and I never felt differently in Mrs. Nourse's presence from what I have felt in any other place.

Rep.—Do you like Mrs. Nourse?

Clara—Very much, from what I have seen of her. She seems to be a real nice lady.

Rep.—Has she ever talked to you about spirits or apparitions?

Clara—Never; except to tell me to speak to Lizzie should she appear.

THE FIRST

Rep.—When did you first [illegible] and under what circumstance[s]

Clara—Three weeks ago [illegible] practicing at the piano in the [illegible] college. It has a door opening out [illegible] porch, but it was closed, with a box against it, to keep it shut. Katy Wright and Bessie Pointer were in the room on the west side of the hall. While practicing, I saw what appeared to be a little girl, coming softly up the stairs. When it reached the top, it stopped with one foot on the upper step, and looked toward it, and asked what it wanted when it shook its head, and then in a moment came toward me, not walking, but gliding. As it approached, I saw and screaming I ran into the room where were Katy Wright and Bessie Pointer, the one reading and the other looking out the window. They screamed, too, and we all rushed to the bed and got on to it, myself on the outside. The figure followed, pulled my dress violently, and then fingered with my hair, which was done up in a net. We screamed all the time. The specter, after pulling at me several moments, went back to the door, stood there a moment, and then crossed the hall to Miss Dora Hill's room, where it knocked, and then tried the door, when I heard it say as if in disappointment: "Oh, Lord!" in a pitiful, weak, hollow voice. It then came back to our door, and beckoned to me with its first finger for about two minutes, when recess was announced, and as some of the scholars came up the stairs, the apparition vanished through the garret door.

Rep.—Did not any of the teachers or scholars hear you and your companions screaming?

Clara—No, sir. The pianos were playing down stairs, and they could not hear us.

Rep.—Did the specter beckon to all who were in the room, or to you alone?

Clara—It seemed to beckon to nobody but me.

Rep.—Did Katy Wright and Bessie Pointer see the apparition?

Clara—They said they did, and continued to say so up to last Monday, but I don't know; they may only have been frightened because I was. I think both attend the school yet, though I heard one had been sent into the country.

Rep.—Did you tell the teachers and scholars about this when they came up stairs?

Clara—Yes, and they laughed, and said it was only my imagination, though Bessie and Katy said they saw it, too, and were crying.

Rep.—Did you tell your Pa, on going home, of what had occurred?

Clara—I did, and he ridiculed me, saying that it was hallucination, and that I must think of it no more, but I knew it was not imagination.

Rep.—Did Dora Hill hear the figure at the door?

Clara—I think she did.

Rep.—When you first saw the figure at the top of the stairway, what did you do?

Clara—I kept on practicing.

Rep.—Were you not frightened?

Clara—I did not, because I thought at first it was little Minnie Meredith.

Rep.—Did you stop playing the piano, and why.

Clara—I did after a little, because the figure kept motionless at the head of the stairs, and I thought it was somebody who wanted to speak to me, and was waiting for me to stop. When I stopped and it came towards me, I saw it was not a living thing, and I screamed and ran away.

HOW IT LOOKED.

Rep.—What was the specter like?

Clara—Like a skeleton, all bone and sinews, covered with a skin, through which I could see, it being very transparent. It was a frightful looking object. Its teeth protruded from a fleshless mouth, and its eyes were deep set, almost in the back of the head. The hair and eyes were deep black, the hair loose and flowing. The face was ugly, but at the same time it had a pale and sorrowful look.

Rep.—Had it any clothing?

Clara—It was dressed in very tight or faded pink, like tarletan, and the dress was trimmed with dingy white ruching. It wore, also, pink or red slippers or hose, I am not sure which. The stockings looked moulded and mildewed, as did also the dress, on which there were heavy spots of mould and greenish slime. The shoes or slippers were also much moulded.

Rep.—Did your companions see it in the same way?

Clara—Yes, sir; they said they did, after hearing my description.

Rep.—Did you return to school next day?

Clara—Yes, sir.

Rep.—Did you go willingly?

Clara—No, sir; I didn't want to go, but Pa said I would not see Lizzie again.

Rep.—Whom do you mean by Lizzie?

Clara—I mean the specter.

Rep—Is that its name?

Clara—Yes, sir.

Rep.—How do you know?

Clara—She told me when I saw her in the college one day.

Rep.—Did it not say its name was Mary?

Clara—No, sir; it said Lizzie.

Rep.—What was its last name?

Clara—It did not tell me.

Rep.—Did it not say its name was Lizzie Davis or Davie or Davison?

Clara—No, sir; but it wrote its full name here in the house last Saturday and Monday nights.

Rep.—How do you know it did?

Clara—Haven't you the papers in the Avalanche office?

Rep.—What was the name written?

Clara—At first on Saturday night Lizzie Davison, which it afterward corrected to Davie. It wrote Lizzie Davie again on Monday night.

Rep.—Who first told you of Lizzie Davie?

Clara—She told me herself and wrote it. I never heard it before.

Rep.—What happened at school the day after you first saw the specter?

Clara—Nothing much. I and the other girls I told you of, were in Dora Hill's room, which was also occupied by Emma Butts.

Rep.—What were you all doing there?

Clara—Reading and studying. I sat on Emma Butts' bed, and Bessie Pointer by me at the foot of it. Katy Wright sat in a chair.

Rep.—Were you or they talking of the apparition?

Clara—No, sir.

Rep.—Did you think of it?

Clara—Yes; I thought of it many times and felt afraid.

Rep.—Did it appear that day?

Clara—It did not.

THE SECOND VISION.

Rep.—When did you see it again?

Clara—The next day, Thursday.

Rep.—Under what circumstances?

Clara—I was in Emma Butts' room. Emma was there; also Dora Hill, Katy Wright and Bessie Pointer. The door was closed. I heard a noise in the hall as if some one was sweeping water on the floor, and scrubbing with a broom. I said, who can that be scrubbing? but did not think of the specter. Emma Butts went and opened the door, and the rest of us followed. As the door opened, I saw Lizzie in the middle of the hall. The others girls did not see her. I screamed and the specter vanished, seeming to go through the garret door as before. Emma Butts and Dora Hill tried to coax me out of the notion that I had seen the specter, and that it was imagination; but I knew it wasn't imagination, and felt frightened.

Rep.—Did the other girls hear the noise in the hall?

Clara—I don't know, but they seemed alarmed.

Rep.—Did you faint?

Clara—No, sir.

Rep.—Did you tell your people on going home?

Clara—I did, and said I would not go to school again; but they all laughed at me, and said I was foolish. Pa said some of the girls were only playing games with me, and he would see Mr. Meredith about it.

Rep.—Did he go to see Mr. Meredith?

Clara—Yes, sir; he did.

Rep.—Are you a Spiritualist?

Clara—I don't know.

Rep.—Have you ever considered yourself a Spiritualist?

Clara—No, sir.

Rep.—did you ever hear any one talk of Spiritualism?

Clara—Never until the jar was dug for.

Rep.—Have you ever attended spiritual meetings or spiritual manifestations?

Clara—I have not.

Rep.—Do you believe in Spiritualism?

Clara—I don't know; I never thought anything about it; I don't understand it.

Rep.—Do you believe there are such things as spirits?

Clara—Yes, sir; for I have seen one.

Rep.—Whose?

Clara—Lizzie is a spirit.

Rep.—How do you know?

Clara—She told me, and I have seen her.

Rep.—Have you ever seen other spirits?

Clara—I have not.

Rep.—You never believed in spirits before?

Clara—No, sir; but I am sure I do now.

Rep.—Now, Clara, don't you know you see the apparition only with your mind's eye?

Clara—Oh, no, sir; I saw it with my real eye, as I see you now, and it has talked to me as I now talk to you. I am sure of that.

Rep.—Who first told you about Jennie?

Clara—Who is Jennie?

Rep.—The specter.

Clara—Her name is Lizzie.

Rep.—Didn't you tell me awhile ago that her name was Jennie?

Clara No, sir; I know her name too well.

Rep.—Well, who first told you of Lizzie?

Clara—She told me herself.

Rep.—When and where did you first see Mrs. Nourse?

Clara—A week ago Tuesday, at Pa's office.

Rep.—You had heard of her before that time?

Clara—No; I never did; I told you so before.

Rep.—What did she say?

Clara—She told me to speak to Lizzie if she appeared again.

Rep.—When did your Pa first tell you that there was something buried in the College garden?

Clara—He never told me.

Rep.—Who did tell you?

Clara—Nobody told me but the specter.

THE THIRD VISION.

Rep.—When did you see the specter again, and what occurred?

Clara—The next Monday. Feeling afraid of the specter, I would not go up stairs, but went into room No. 5 on the first floor to practice. Miss Jackie Boone, the teacher, wouldn't let any one go in with me, so I went in alone and fastened the door-catch. After I had played about five minutes, the door suddenly flew open, and looking around, I saw the specter standing in the hall. It looked as it did before, but had in one of its hands a little bag and a stick with a sharp point. The bag looked as if made of bed-ticking, and the stick looked old and rusty; it might have been iron. The specter glided toward me and stood in the doorway. I ran to the windows and tried to get out, but could not open them. I then tried to get through the door, and was caught by the dress by Lizzie, who held me with one hand, while with the other she shook the little bag up near her ear. I screamed and broke away, rushing into Miss Boone's room, on the opposite side of the hall. She was giving music lessons to some of the girls. The specter first tried to keep me from getting out of the room in which I was in. When I got to Miss Boone's room, I told her the little red girl was in No. 5. She took me by the hand, and we went back and hunted all around the room, and in the hall, but saw nothing. Miss Boone would not believe me, and laughed at me real hard.

Rep.—Was Mr. Meredith there?

Clara—Yes, sir; He laughed too, and said he would set a trap for the ghost. After which he scolded me for frightening the girls.

THE FOURTH VISION.

Rep.—What occurred next?

Clara—Next day I went up to Pa's office before going to school, and saw Mrs. Nourse there. She was talking to him about some business. Pa told her about Lizzie, and she told me I must speak to it, that it would do me no harm. I then went to school. In the afternoon, myself and some other girls were in the hall watching for the ghost, when it came up suddenly. I don't know where it came from. It seemed to rise out of the floor. I screamed and some of the other girls screamed too. Bessie Pointer says she saw a shadow. Frida Stewart swung her arms all about her as if to keep the spirit away, and seemed to be unable to control them, as they kept swinging some time. Some of the girls urged me to speak to the spirit, but I declined through fear. Each one spoke to it, but seemed to get no answer, and then I was urged again to speak to it. I then said: "In the name of the Lord,"—that's the way I was told to address it —"what do you want?" It pointed towards some stumps on the west side of the house, and told me to go and dig five feet under a stump, and I would find a jar that would be of value to me. I ran to the window and looked out at the stump, and was turning to ask which stump, when it vanished. I was much excited, but not as much afraid as I had been before. The specter had the stick and little bag again, and looked very sad and pitiful, but seemed to cheer up and get less ugly when I spoke.

Rep.—Did any of the other girls see it?

Clara—Bessie Pointer said she saw a shadow, and also heard a sort of mumbling, and thought she heard the word stump.

Rep.—When did you see this thing again?

Clara—On Wednesday. I went out to the garden to sharpen my slate pencil, and while so engaged I saw the figure appear on a stump and try to call my notice. I pretended not to see it and went on sharpening my pencil, when it started towards me with its arms stretched out. I was not much afraid at first, and thought if I appeared not to notice it, it would go away; but when it came towards me I got very much frightened, screamed loudly, and attempted to run away. It stepped on another stump, looked very pitifully and said, pleadingly: "Don't be afraid of me; I will not hurt you; my name is Lizzie. What I am about to say you must not tell anybody but your father." I stood as it fastened to the spot. The figure then went on to say that she was the last of her people, and that the property belonged to her—I mean the college property. She said she wanted me to have it, because I had set her free by speaking to her. That Mr. Brinkley claimed the property, but it did not belong to him, and that he should not have it. She would take it away from him. If I didn't get the property no one could ever live in the house in peace. She had haunted the place for a long time but could never get anybody she wanted to speak to her, but now she felt free because I had spoken to her, and for that reason she wanted me to have the place. Mr. Brinkley had no right to it. She then told me again there was something under that stump that would be of value to me—the stump on which she stood. It then vanished, and I ran into the house.

Rep.—Did the specter say all her people were dead?

Clara—No; she said she was the last one who had any right to that property.

Rep.—Did you feel glad at the prospect of getting the property?

Clara—I did not think anything about it.

Rep.—Did you believe there was anything under the stump?

Clara—I was sure of it after she told me.

Rep.—Did you ever think so before?

Clara—I never did, and never knew until Lizzie told me about anything being buried there.

Rep.—Do you believe a jar was dug up there?

Clara—I know there was.

Rep.—Is it the jar the apparition spoke of?

Clara—I know it is.

Rep.—Didn't somebody put it there after the digging was done?

Clara—I don't think so.

Rep—Is there anything else there?

Clara—I don't know.

Rep.—Have you the jar now?

Clara—I have not.

Rep.—Is it in a safe place?

Clara—Yes, sir.

Rep.—How do you know?

Clara—My Pa has told me so.

Rep.—Why is it not to be opened in sixty days?

Clara—Because the spirit wrote that it must not.

Rep.—When?

Clara—On Monday night.

Rep.—Do you know what it contains?

Clara—I think I do.

Rep—Did not Lizzie tell you what was in it?

Clara—No. She wrote on Saturday night that it had money, jewelry and valuable papers.

Rep.—How did it come to write?

Clara—Mrs. Nourse was here.

Rep.—Was that the first time you saw Mrs. Nourse?

Clara—No, sir; I saw her once before at Pa's office.

Rep.—Did you go back to school after Wednesday?

Clara—No; I didn't want to go, and then it rained Thursday and Friday.

THE DIGGING.

Rep.—When did you next have communication with this specter?

Clara—On Saturday night.

Rep.—What did it say?

Clara—It said nothing, but wrote many things, which were given to a reporter who came here.

Rep.—Was that here, in your house?

Clara—Yes, sir; I was in a trance or asleep, and don't know much of what was written, except that it was the same Lizzie had told me before.

Rep.—How did you feel?

Clara—I didn't feel anything, but afterwards felt like I had been asleep.

Rep.—What occurred next?

Clara—We all went down to the college to find the stump.

Rep.—Did you point out the stump?

Clara—Not at first, because I wasn't sure which was the stump, but my friends told me to call upon Lizzie, and I did so. She appeared and showed me the stump and said to dig on one side of it.

Rep.—Hadn't Lizzie pointed it out to you before?

Clara—She did, but she ran from one stump to another to get near me, and I was uncertain which of the stumps was the right one.

Rep.—Did you believe there was anything under the stump?

Clara—I was sure there was, because Lizzie told me.

Rep.—Didn't your Pa and Mrs. Nourse tell you so too?

Clara—They never said anything about it.

Rep.—What took place at the college?

Clara—Do you mean on Saturday night?

Rep.—Yes.

Clara—After the shape pointed out the place, the men began digging, and I went home.

Rep.—Did the specter look as before?

Clara—Just the same, and very sad and earnest.

Rep.—Why did you call on it?

Clara—Because the crowd asked me to, so as to be sure of the place.

THE SPECTER AGAIN.

Rep.—When did you see Bessie again?

Clara—Do you mean Bessie Pointer?

Rep.—No, the apparition.

Clara—On Monday morning, in the yard back of the house.

Rep.—Did you go to school that day?

Clara—No, sir.

Rep.—How did you come to see it?

Clara—I called on it to appear. My sister told me to do so.

Rep.—Why did your sister ask you to summon it?

Clara—Because she wanted me to ask if the men were digging right.

Rep.—What did Lizzie say?

Clara—I called her, hardly thinking she would come; but she did come and seemed very mournful. I was frightened, but did not run away. I asked my sister if she did not see it, and she said no. I then spoke to Lizzie and asked her if the men were digging right. She said no; that they were shunning the right place, and wanted to get the secret themselves, and that I must go and dig. She then left me.

Rep.—Where did she go?

Clara—I don't know; she vanished.

Rep.—Was this the first time you had seen Lizzie away from the college?

Clara—It was, but she wrote Saturday.

Rep.—What did you do after Lizzie disappeared?

Clara—Ma and Mrs. Wasson had gone to the college, and they sent for me. I went with Miss Franklin. When I got there, the ladies got all around me and said I must call Lizzie to tell the men where to dig. I refused at first, but afterward did call, and just as I said: "Lizzie," I saw her rise up behind one of the men who was digging and point one side of the hole.

Rep.—Had they not dug in the right place?

Clara—They started right, but slanted off in digging and got away from the jar.

Rep.—Did you tell the negro to change?

Clara—Yes; but he seemed to be afraid, or didn't want to change.

Rep.—What then?

Clara—Lizzie said I must dig.

Rep.—Were you frightened.

Clara—Very much; I felt trembling all over.

Rep.—What did you do?

Clara—I told my ma and others what Lizzie said, and they advised me to get into the hole and dig. I hesitated, but finally did get into the hole and commence to dig. I turned one spade full and was about to turn another, when I saw the jar; I stooped to take hold of it and fainted.

Rep.—What kind of a jar was it?

Clara—I don't know; it looked like an earthen jar, but I could only see the top of the rim, over which there seemed to be something like tin. It was a little to one side, of where the men had been digging.

Rep.—What next?

Clara—I don't know; when I came to, I was on the porch of the college and the men were digging. I then went home.

Rep.—Did you go back again?

Clara—I did not.

Rep.—How came the brick work under the stump?

Clara—I do not know.

Rep.—Didn't some one tell you?

Clara—Nobody told me anything about it.

Rep.—Did you ever dream anything about it?

Clara—I did not.

Rep.—When was the jar found?

Clara—On Monday night. Pa found it.

Rep.—How came he to find it?

Clara—Lizzie wrote that he must go, because I was too weak and nervous.

Rep.—Who went with him?

Clara—Mrs. Nourse.

Rep.—Did he bring back the jar?

Clara—He did, and gave it to me.

Rep.—Did you believe it was the jar; that they found it in the hole?

Clara—I was sure of it.

Rep.—Don't you think he played a trick on you?

Clara—I am sure he did not.

Rep.—You believe it to be the jar?

Clara—I say I am sure of it.

Rep.—How did you feel after your Pa gave you the jar.

Clara—I felt real glad.

Rep—Because you felt rich?

Clara—Because I felt that Lizzie and I were out of trouble.

Rep.—Were not you and Lizzie very fond of each other when little children?

Clara—I never knew her.

Rep—Why, then, has she haunted you?

Clara—I'm sure I can't tell.

THE PROGRESSIVE SPIRIT.

Rep.—Has she appeared to you since the jar was found?

Rep.—Yes, sir. I saw her Wednesday night; that is, I saw her face.

Rep.—Where?

Clara—There, over the parlor door—right under that nail.

Rep.—What was she doing there?

Clara—I don't know.

Rep.—What did she say?

Clara—She only smiled.

Rep.—How long did she stay?

Clara—About two minutes.

Rep.—Were you not frightened?

Clara—Oh, no; I am not afraid of her now; she looks better every time; she has less of a grave look about her now.

Rep.—Why have you seen her more than once since the jar was found?

Clara—Yes, sir; I saw her again Thursday morning.

Rep—Where?

Clara—In ma's room. I was writing a letter to my sister, and she came up between the table and the wall, looking much better than before and smiling at me. She wore the same clothes, but they looked cleaner, and she more heavenly than earthly. I asked her what she wanted, and she said she had come to see me, and told me I must give her love to my sister to whom I was writing.

Rep—Where is Lizzie now?

Clara—I don't know.

Rep.—Don't you want to see her?

Clara—I don't think I do.

Rep.—Who put the jar in that hole?

Clara—I don't know; Lizzie never told me. She wouldn't tell me.

Rep.—Why?

Clara—I don't know.

Rep.—Why does Lizzie look better now than before the jar was found?

Clara—I don't know, except that it is because she feels free and is passing away.

Rep.—Are you afraid to go in dark places alone?

Clara—Oh, yes; I wouldn't go out in that hall or any other dark place for anything.

Rep.—Do you expect to see Lizzie again?

Clara—I'm sure I don't know.

Rep.—How old is Lizzie?

Clara—I don't know; she looks as if she might be six or eight years old.

Rep.—Well, Clara, haven't I worn you out with questions?

Clara—Oh, no; I'll answer all you want. I have been asked many more questions than you have asked me.

Rep.—Do you know why I ask you these questions?

Clara—I suppose you want to put it all in the newspaper.

Rep.—Have you answered all my questions truthfully?

Clara—Yes, Sir.

Rep.—Would you swear it?

Clara—Yes, sir.

Rep.—Did the girls in the school believe in your visions.

Clara—They did at first, but Mr. Meredith and the teachers made fun of them and laughed them out of it.

So ended the interview, which the strange child bore with singular patience and good nature, never faltering or stammering even under the most rigid examination. She was cross-questioned many times, and gave in each instance the direct answer.

THINGS NOT VISIONARY.

Several curious facts are worthy of mention in connection with the narrative of this girl, and are topics of excited and earnest discussion in all circles. Briefly they are as follows:

There was a Lizzie Davie, and she died in Brinkley College some time in 1861.

She is described by persons who remember her well, as a child of remarkable intelligence, beauty and precociousness, and she had black flowing hair and black eyes.

Persons who were at her funeral say she was laid out and buried in a dress of pink, with white trimming, and pink slippers. They remember this from the singularity of the dress, it being the custom, almost universally, to shroud children in white.

She was about six or eight years of age, and is well remembered for her beauty, brightness and goodness.

It is remembered by old and reliable citizens, that there was a chancery suit about the ground on which Brinkley College stands, and that there was much scandal at the time. The college was built by Mr. Davie for a residence, about 1855. The chancery suit, as can be remembered, concerned the ground only.

It matters not about the jar alleged to have been found under the stump at Brinkley College. Clara Robertson is the object of interest. Who will undertake to explain her case, theoretically or practically?

Another Christian (?) in the Field.

PEORIA, Ill., Jan. 21.—A scan. mag. case has transpired here, in which a prominent jeweler, a married man, and a well-known lady music teacher are the principals. It seems that the lady has been boarding at the house of the man alluded to, between whom and himself illicit intercourse had been going on for some time. The developments came to light recently in the shape of a child, which was deposited on a neighbor's door-step, and the matter hushed up. But the wife, learning about the affair, raised a tremendous excitement, and left town for the South. She made it too warm for the husband and his mistress, however, and they stole away to parts unknown on the early morning train the other day. The man is a prominent member of the Baptist Church, the Young Men's Christian Association, and the founder of several Mission Sunday-schools, and was highly respected by the entire community.—Sturgis (Mich.) Journal.

SPIRIT MESSAGES

Given During the Years 1860 to 1870, inclusive,—from FRANKLIN, LINCOLN, ADAMS, JACKSON, WEBSTER, PENN, and others to the Author,

THOMAS RICHMOND.

This is one of the most interesting books in the whole catalogue of Spiritualist publications. Its author is well and widely known throughout the Western States, he having been one of the early pioneers, and a man of extraordinary energy and ability, who would make his mark in any country. After an active business life of over sixty years, he is in Seventy-fifth year, in full strength and beauty, and as capable of doing business as he was fifty years ago. His ability, energy, and acquaintance with many of the leading men of the country, pointed him out to Franklin and other distinguished spirits as the most fitting instrument with which they were to accomplish a mighty undertaking. The manner in which they worked through him, and the results achieved are herein related by the author in a book of 486 pages.

PRICE: Cloth, $1.50; postage, 16 cents. Enamled paper sides and cloth back, 75 cents, postage, 6 cents.

For Sale, Wholesale and Retail, by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 187 & 189 South Clark street, Chicago.

SPIRIT ARTIST.

MRS. E. A. BLAIR, MEDIUM.

Mrs. Blair, one of the most wonderful Spirit Artists in the world (specimens of whose work can be seen in the Reception-Room of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING House), is now prepared to furnish beautiful specimens of her work, ranging in price from five to one hundred dollars, to suit the purchaser.

It should be borne in mind that Mrs. Blair executes this work when perfectly blindfolded (and, when convenient, before a public audience), and with a rapidity ever equalling in this sphere of entertainment.

The manner in which these paintings are executed was published in No. 3, Vol. 9, of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

For beauty of style and artistic finish they cannot be surpassed. They are worthy of a prominent place in the drawing-room or the picture-gallery. Considering that these paintings are such positive demonstrations of SPIRIT POWER IN THE FINE ARTS, no SPIRITUALIST should be without one or more of them.

We will receive orders for any priced pictures desired —ranging from five to one hundred dollars. For ten dollars and upward, it will be well for the person according to send his or her own autograph, that the Spirit Artist may get on rapport with him or her, the better to enable him to execute a more appropriate piece of work, to order.

In sending orders, address S. S. JONES, 189 South Clark street, Chicago, Ill., inclosing the money by a Post Office Money Order, Bank Check, or Registered Letter.

Frames will be furnished at wholesale prices, when ordered, ranging from one dollar upward, and sent by express to any part of the country.

Discussion Between E. V. Wilson and Rev. Clark Braden.

[Notes taken during a Discussion on the Resolution,—"Resolved, That the Bible, King James' Version, sustains Modern Spiritualism in all its Phases and Teachings."]

E. V. WILSON affirms.—Rev. CLARK BRADEN denies.

Mr Braden's first position.—After reviewing my reply to him, he repeats much of what he said the first evening; then demands of me what I accept as actual spiritual phenomena. Do you accept raps, moving matter, sounds, healing the sick, seeing spirits? Do you accept catalepsy, wondrous feats of strength frequently found with the insane, with men when intoxicated?

2nd.—Mr. Wilson denies the law of God, but accepts the law against familiar spirits. Will my friend say that these commands against familiar spirits, wizards and witches are sustained by God, and are worthy of the support and confidence of the people? Where is the dividing line?

3rd.—Spiritualists claim to be moved by spirits, and the Spiritualists accept of this interpretation. Will my friend deny this? Don't you come out and define? Do spirits out of the body do these things, or not? Why go away to the spirits for what may be done by the spirit in the body?

4th.—Angels are not men; hence, if they did these things in the past, it was not the spirits of dead men that did these things. My friend must bring positive fact testimony that these things are done by disembodied spirits, or he fails utterly in his resolution. Only twice in the whole Bible do immortal men appear, and there were both extraordinary occasions; once when Jesus and the three apostles were on the mountain at the transfiguration, and the second, 1st Sam., 28 h chapter. A very doubtful witness indeed.

5th.—Reconsider it an insult for any one to call on the spirit of my sainted father, wife and child, and would resent it as such. They never came down from heaven and tooted on horns, rapped on tables or moved about furniture at 25 cents fifty cents a head for a gaping multitude. I again say I would resent it as an insult to call on them in their rest in the bosom of God. No; they have never done any such thing, nor will they.

6th.—Dr. Newton is one of the greatest humbugs of the age, and an impostor of the first water, I say and believe.

7th.—Hunter's pictures fit my old man or woman in the audience, and could be taken by any, as tests or likenesses. I have seen these pictures, and they are all alike, and I can have them imitated in any photographer's gallery in this city. They were proved to be frauds.

I will answer points I reply in detail:

1st.—I accept vision, conscious and unconscious trance state, that is, seeing of spirits with natural eyes, and with the senses of the soul. I accept the physical phenomena, as produced by spirits, from the raps to the movement of ponderous bodies. I accept of the musical phenomena, as produced by spirits independent of, or dependent on, media. I accept writings messages through our media. I accept photography, pictures, drawings. All of these acknowledgements briefly included in my definition of the resolution. I accept the influence of animals by spirits.

2nd.—I reply, I have done nothing of the kind. I accept the law of God as immutable, unchangeable and eternal principles. If one single law of God requires alteration, amending or repealing, then every law of God is subject to the same rule when necessity requires it. Therefore, God made the tree of knowledge of good and evil and planted it in the midst of the garden of Eden, placing it as a temptation in the way of the man, then forbade the man eating of it, under penalty of instant death, —Gen 2: 9; thereby informing the man of the tempting fruit. Now, the Bible teaches that God and evil were older than the man was in the garden; teaches that good and evil continues from Eden to Patmos; teaches that they will continue. This godly tree was an immutable attribute of God, for God says:

"I make peace; I create the evil; I, the Lord, do all these things."—Isaiah, 45: 7.

Hence, if God created evil, it is a part of God's infinite nature. Spiritualism, being fruit plucked off the tree of knowledge of good and evil, is that of God. The Bible teaches that the work of God endureth forever. In the third chapter of Genesis I read that "the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made." The Bible teaches that the serpent was of God; that evil exists, continues to exist, and will exist forever, or unto the end. The Bible teaches that it was continuous, and will continue forever, and that man was and is the work of God. The Bible teaches:

"In the beginning was the word, and the word was with God, and the word was God. All things were made by him, and without him was not anything made that was made."—John, 1: 1, 3; Gen., 1: 1.

Therefore the Bible logically and practically proves that Spiritualism is the work of God.

3rd.—What evidence does he give of this his assertion? The same he gave the first evening. The body moves the table. Bring the evidences here in this room, and let us cross examine them.

4th.—The word angel means a messenger, a spirit, or a spiritual being. In 1st Cor., 15: 20, I read, "Flesh and blood can not inherit the kingdom of God," hence there are only spiritual beings in heaven, or the kingdom of God.

In the 18th chapter of Genesis I find three men of flesh and blood. They eat material that forms flesh and blood. They can not be angels or men under spirit influence; in the 19th chapter of Genesis, I find two men under influence; in Isaiah, 8: 19, 20, we are commanded to seek unto the dead, for the living to the dead. In 1st Cor., 15: 21, I read, by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead." In 1st Cor., 14: 33, I find that "the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets." In Heb., 13: 2, we are ordered to entertain strangers, men or women, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares. In 1st John 4: 1, we are ordered to try the spirits. In the 1st chapter of Revelations, I find Jesus sends an angel to John. In the 10th chapter, John confesses he was under spirit influence. In Rev., 19: 10, "I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren that have the testimony of Jesus." In the 22nd chapter and 8th verse, the same statement is made, adding the definite article before the occupation of the angel. I often go on earth, "and of thy brethren, the prophets" In 1st Sam., 28 h chapter, the spirit of Samuel influences the woman, talks with Saul, and in the 17th and 18th verses, tells Saul why the Lord hath done these things unto him. In 2nd Chron., 18 h chapter, I find four hundred men under the influence of a lying spirit, sent out by God, and another man under the influence of good spirits, exposing them. In 1st Cor., 14th chapter, speaking in tongues, piping on harps, influencing things without life, are referred to. In Num., 22nd chapter, Balaam's ass is influenced, sees a spirit, and speaks to Balaam. In 2nd Kings, 6: 6, 7, iron is made to swim. In Dan., 6: 22nd, I find a spirit shutting the mouths of the lions. In 1st Kings, 17: 6, the ravens brought him bread and flesh morning and evening. In 1st Kings, 19: 6, I find a spirit cooking a cake on coals, and bringing a cruse of water to Elijah. In 2nd Kings, 2: 24, two she-bears are influenced and kill forty-two little children. In Gen. 21: 17, the spirit calleth Hagar, and promises help to her and Ishmael. In the 12 h chapter of 1st Corinthians, I find all manner of spiritual gifts promised. In Acts, 1: 9, I find two men with the apostles, who are spirits. In Acts, 2: 17, 20, many signs and wonders are promised. In the 9th chapter, Paul is influenced and converted, and Jesus declares that he is Jesus of Nazareth. In 9: 30, Paul's eyes are healed, and he preaches of Jesus. In the 12 h chapter of Acts, Peter is imprisoned, tied by men to men guarded by many men. A spirit unties him, leads him out of [illegible] gate opens of its own accord, and [illegible] goes to the door of Mark's house and [illegible] him. Rhoda goes to the door, [illegible] her. She does not let him in, but rep[illegible] they declare it to be his spirit.

In Heb., 13: 22, 23, I read of an [illegible] company of angels, the spirits of just [illegible]. Matt., 7: 7, I find, "Ask, and it shall be given; seek, and ye shall find."

In John, 14: 13, 14, if ye ask anything. In Matt., 10: 13, in Luke, 9: 13, the people testify that Jesus is the spirit of one of the old prophets. Jesus does not deny this—does forbid telling he is Christ. "In my name I will do it."

Again, in 15: 10; in 16. 23, 24; in 1st John, 3: 22; in Mark, 16: 17, 19, I read:

"These signs shall follow them that believe; in my name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover."

Finally I find, Rev., 1: 9, "The thing that hath been is that which shall be, and that which is done, is that which shall be done."

In the 3rd chapter, 15 h verse, I read:

"That which hath been, is now, and that which is to be, hath already been, and God requireth that at which is past."

Here the law is continued from Genesis to Revelations, and promised to all who ask for it. I believed, I asked, and I received.

5th.—To this I reply, I have ever respected the memory of the dead. I love them, and know that they love me in return; and I know that the sainted nature of my mother, my wife, and four children will not be insulted when I call on them, for love is eternal. My opponent is welcome to the coarse ritual at millions of noble men and women, who know that the immortals are with them.

6th.—I reply, this is about as valuable as anything he has uttered, and it amounts to nothing.

7th.—The truth of my assertion was proved in Justice Brown's court, by the testimony of Varley, the electrician; of Livermore, the banker; of Silver, the photographist; of Gilmore, the author, and Edmonds, the judge.

Third Night.

Mr. Braden said:

1st.—I have shown that the Holy Spirit and angels are not the spirits of dead men. The Bible declares them not to be. That God and the angels appeared to men as men, is evident. Does it follow that they are men? Mr. Wilson must prove them to be the spirits of men who were once inhabitants of this earth, and when he has done this, it will be time for me to meet his testimony, and not before.

2nd.—We will call upon Mr. Wilson to prove that the Bible teaches the continuance of these phenomena. Does the Bible teach that the raps were produced by the disembodied spirits of men? Does the Bible teach that they continue to rap? Does the Bible sustain rape? Does the Bible teach us to consume spirits by intemperation.

3rd.—Is it more difficult for an angel to assume the form of a man, than a spirit? We answer no. Why, then, should we accept of spirits, when angels are as well able to do these things as the spirits of men are? May not the spirit in the body do these things? Who shall limit the spirit in the body?

4 h.—A pleasant sermon—resting his weary brain on man's physical and spiritual nature, and the revelation to God, and what is necessary in this life for a future life of joy. You must first believe the Bible; second, believe the Lord Jesus Christ; third, serve him with all your heart, soul and mind.

5 h.—Mr. Wilson utters a syllogism which is as fair a representation as one I will offer. Mr. Wilson believes that the Fejees exist. Mr. Wilson believes that France has been devastated. Therefore the Fejees is devastated. Now, there is just as much sense in my syllogism and in its application to this resolution, as there is in Mr. Wilson's, in fact, I made no such concession as is embraced in his syllogism.

6 h.—What has the fact that God created evil, to do with the question?

7 h.—Read Isaiah, 8: 19, 20: "And when they shall say unto you, seek unto them that have familiar spirits, and unto wizards that peep and that mutter, should not a people seek unto their God—not the living to the dead, but to the law and testimony."

8 h.—Mr. Braden declares that Samuel never appeared; that it was a familiar spirit. In the 1st Sam., 10: 15, proves the fact. God had died for his transgression which he committed against the Lord, even against the word of the Lord, which he kept not, and also for asking counsel of one that was a familiar spirit to inquire of it." Hence Saul did not see Samuel.

9 h.—The doctrines of Spiritualism—do they believe thus and so?

To all of which, we reply:

1st.—We deny this. In Psalms, 104: 4, we read, "He maketh his angels spirits." Also, in Heb., 1: 7. "But when they shall arise from the dead, they are angels in heaven." Mark, 12: 25. The authorities in English declare that an angel is a messenger, a spirit, or a spiritual being.

In R. v., 8: 1, the revelation of Jesus Christ,—which God gave unto him to show unto his servants; things which must shortly come to pass, and he sent and signified by his angel and his servant John. John says, "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day and heard behind me a great voice, [10] say ing, I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: what thou seest write in a book. [11]. And I turned to see the voice that spake with me, and being turned, I saw the Son of Man [13] clothed with a garment down to the foot, [18] and when I saw him, I fell at his feet as dead. And he laid his right hand upon me, saying unto me, fear not. I am the first and the last. [17]. I am he that liveth and was dead, and behold, I am alive forevermore. Amen. [18]. And I fell at his feet to worship him, and he said unto me, see thou do it not. I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren, that hath the testimony of Jesus."—Rev., 19: 10.

"And I, John, saw these things and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, I fell down before the feet of the angel that showed me these things. Then saith he unto me, see thou do it not, for I am thy fellow servant, and of thy brethren, the prophets. I am Alpha and Omega. I, Jesus, have sent mine angel, (spirit of Jesus) to testify unto you these things. In the churches I am the root and offspring of David."—Rev. 22: 8, 17.

Here we find Jesus in a second rate position in his kingdom. He is an agent. He receives a command, sends the spirit of one who declares that he was a man, was with John on earth, served in the prophets, was dead. "I am alive forevermore. Amen"

2nd.—The Bible is for all nations a law forever, and whatever in it is forbidden or approved, is equally applicable now as in the days of Jesus or Moses. We care not a fig whether the phenomena is brought about by good men or bad men, by good spirits or bad spirits, but that it is brought about. The resolution is, not what the Bible requires us to teach, but what the Bible contains in history of what took place in its day, from Adam to John inclusive.

I am not required to prove that Spiritualism sustains the Bible, or the teachings of the Bible, but that the phenomena of modern Spiritualism has its antecedents in the Bible, King James' Version. Does it parallel and maintain modern spiritual phenomena? We now hold that we have clearly proved, first, that the sainted dead are tenants of the spirit world in heaven, 1st Sam., 28; Matt., 16; Luke, 9; Acts 9 and 23; 1st John, 4: 1; Heb., 13: 12; Rev., 1, 19 and 22; also by Mr. Braden's frank concession, and by my testimony; second, that the demons and devils of the Old and New Testament were spirits of the wicked dead men. Mr. Braden concedes it. Third, we have duplicated all the principal phases of physical phenomena from the Old and New Testament.

3rd.—We reply, no; for we believe that every being in eternity from "God on the throne to the footman at the gate" was at one time a being of flesh and blood, either on this planet or some other.

4th.—We congratulate him on it—it was a very fair effort.

5th.—Our syllogism was this. Mr. Braden concedes that the sainted dead exist in a tenants condition, have appeared on earth; that the demons and devils of the Bible are the spirits of the wicked dead; were on earth; concedes the phenomena claimed by Spiritualists. Hold, therefore, as a logical sequence from the premises, that the phenomena was and are produced by these spirits.

6th.—Everything; for God can do nothing that is wrong. If He created evil, he created it as a balance wheel in some other principle. The heavens can lose; the earth, moon and stars continue; angels continue; men and women continue in His creations and when any part of this syllabic, immutable creation ceases, then the Bible argument will cease. Hence the Bible being authority sustaining this creative and infinite being, sustains all of his works. "I create the evil."—Isaiah, 45: 7. "Shall there be evil in the city and the Lord hath not done it?"—Amos, 3: 6. "I, the Lord, do all these things."—Isaiah 45: 7. "All things were made by Him, and without Him was not anything made that was made."—John, 1: 3.

THE VOICES

Three Poems.

VOICE OF SUPERSTITION.
VOICE OF NATURE.
VOICE OF A PEBBLE.

By Warren Sumner Barlow.

THIS volume is startling in its originality of purpose, and is destined to make deeper inroads among sectarian minds than any work that has hitherto appeared.

THE VOICE OF SUPERSTITION takes the creeds at their word, and proves by numerous passages from the Bible that the God of Moses has been defeated by Satan, from the Garden of Eden to Mount Calvary!

THE VOICE OF NATURE represents God in the light of Reason and Philosophy—in His unchangeable and glorious attributes. While others have too often only demolished, the author has erected a beautiful Temple on the ruins of superstition. Judge Baker, of New York, in his review of this poem, says: "It will unquestionably cause the scales to be classed among the ablest and most gifted didactic poets of the age."

THE VOICE OF A PEBBLE delineates the individuality in matter and Mind, fraternal Charity and Love.

The book is a repository of original thought, swaking noble conceptions of God and man, terrible and pleasing in style, and is one of the few works that will grow with its years and mature with the centuries. It is already ade ired by the thousands of readers.

Printed in beautiful type, on heavy, fine paper, bound in beveled boards, in good style; nearly 200 pages. Price $1.25, postage 16 cents. Very liberal discount to the trade. For sale by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 189 South Clark St., Chicago, Ill

PROF. HOWE'S

GRAMMAR.

The writer of this useful book has had a practical experience in the art of teaching the branches of which he treats. He had long been impressed that a shorter pathway to grammar than that which led through the perplexing subtleties of the text books could be secured; and with much skill devised his seven-Hour system of oral teaching. Appeals from his audiences and requests from correspondents abroad became so numerous and importunate, that he was induced to put his ideas into print to satisfy the public demand. His discoveries in the science are many and startling, reducing the study of grammar to a few lessons. Prof. Howe's unlimited governing power of the Transitive Verb from 30,000 words to seven; his rotating or vibrating "S," securing syntactical agreement in seven-Hour system; and Noun; his exposition of the Subjunctive Mood and Preposition, with many other interesting features of the work, are not only original, but bring with very great propriety be considered inspirational. These are of the utmost value to the the public writer, the platform speaker, the clergyman, the student, and to all who desire attention to any one of them will protect any intelligent person from erring once in a lifetime!

The book is got up in pamphlet form of about 80 pages, strong and neat covers, with large plain type, containing everything within, in its simplest essence, to constitute the Practical Grammarian. It is not sold for the value of the paper, printing, binding, but for the Seven-Hour grammatical education contained within.

Price—cloth $1.00. Paper 50 cents. For sale by the RELIGIO PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 187 & 189 S. Clark St., Chicago.

THE HIEROPHANT,

OR

Gleanings from the Past.

BY O. C. STEWART.

"Being an exposition of Biblical astronomy, and the symbolism and mysteries on which were founded all ancient religious and secret societies, with an explanation of the dark sayings and allegories that abound in the Pagan, Jewish and Christian Bibles, also the real sense of the doctrines and observances of the modern Christian churches."

The above is a good deal to promise the reader that he will find done up in a neat little 16 mo. book of 324 pages, but we assure our readers that they will find all the subjects mentioned treated in a clear, concise, and satisfactory manner.

The book has already passed through several editions, and the demand, of late, has greatly increased.

ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM.

A MANUAL OF

SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

By Hudson Tuttle.

WITH PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR. PRICE $2.00; Postage 24c.

This work embodies the results of the author's researches and experience during the past twenty years, and is, without doubt, the most thorough presentation of the subject of Modern Spiritualism before the public.

Dealing, as it does, with a question in which the interest of all mankind is centered, it cannot fail to command universal attention.

While the experience of thousands will repudiate some of the conclusions the author arrives at, they will still be able to obtain much invaluable information from the book. It is a good book to place in the hands of every person who would know more of what it is that is waking the world to new hopes and aspirations, and planting a tree of life beside every man's door.

A BOOK FOR WOMEN;

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

A book by a woman, for women, on the diseases of the sex. The LITERAL CHRISTIAN, speaking of the book says:

"A more complete work in the whole of its prominence is the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had of its class. It is written for women; it is full of wise counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people feel most ignorance. It is a safe book for young people to read, for any body indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to such subjects. There is not a sentence in it that can be perverted, or misused, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country."

Harper's Magazine says:

"We wish the chapter 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

"I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

Godey's Lady's Book says:

"This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class we have yet seen."

COSMOLOGY,

BY

George M'Ilvaine Ramsay, M.D.

THIS work is purely scientific, and the subjects treated upon are handled with care and great ability. The eminent author in his introduction says:

Man has various means and avenues by and through which he may and does obtain knowledge, the most obvious of which are those faculties of the mind known as the five senses.

Resulting from a combination of those five special faculties is the power of concentration, called memory, by which he is enabled to accumulate knowledge.

Having learned a fact yesterday, and another fact to-day, on to-morrow he may combine these two facts, and the child of a father, by much the same process, carefully, as the chemist, by a union of two kinds of substances, produces a new, and third kind.

Man has another faculty which we have all agreed to call reason, by which he further adds to his knowledge through a process called analogy. Having obtained a limited knowledge of something, he sees, or feels or hears, he thence reasons by analogy, either retrospectively or prospectively and thereby gains further knowledge of it, if on traveling through a forest he first time he sees a great many trees standing upright and a few lying down, his reason intuitively suggests that those trees lying down had formerly stood upright, and those standing upright would eventually fall to the ground. Still extending his chain of thought, he would learn that some of those trees lying down looked fresh and life-like, much like those yet standing, while others again, were very much decayed. His conclusions in such a case would inevitably be, that some of those trees had long since fallen, while others had fallen but recently.

Now, this reasoning by analogy, as a means of obtaining knowledge, is of paramount value when we come to study the heavenly bodies, including our earth.

The life of man, and indeed the race of man is so short, when compared with the age of suns and moons and planets, that comparatively nothing could be known in regard to either, if man's knowledge were limited to the experience of his race. Hence we find that man is capable of learning what was and what will be, from what exists. And notwithstanding this crowning attribute, all cosmologists must in the beginning, start without wherein to rest so much as the sole of their foot, and make the best of such foundation We claim no more.

THE BIBLE IN THE BALANCE,

A Book for the Age and the Times,

and one that should be in the hands of every liberal man and woman in the land.

You want it for your own instruction, that you may be furnished with acknowledged authority to meet the arguments of the theologian, historian, chronologist and scientific man with his own weapons.

It discusses the matter of Bible canons, versions, translations and revisions with ability, citing none but authors in the highest repute, and those that are above criticism.

The book is printed in excellent style, 12 mo., on new type and fine paper, with beautiful illustrations of the mounds and mound-relics of the Mississippi Valley.

It is substantially bound in cloth and contains three hundred and twenty pages.

The interest felt in the work is so great that orders were received for nearly the whole of the first edition before it was published, one party alone having received orders for over three hundred copies.

A BEAUTIFUL LEGEND.

Softly fell the touch of twilight on Judea's silent hills;
Slowly crept the pence of moonlight o'er Judea's trembling rills.

In the temple's court, conversing, reve[illegible]at apart;
Seven grand and hoary sages, wise of he[illegible]re of heart.

"What is rest?" said Rabbi Judah, [illegible] steadfast gaze.
"Answer, ye whose tolls have burdened through the march of many days."

"To have gained," said Rabbi Ezra, "decent wealth and goodly store Without sin, by honest labor—nothing less and nothing more."

"To have found," said Rabbi Joseph, meekness in his gentle eyes,
"A foretaste of heaven's sweetness in home's blessed paradise."

"To have wealth, and power, and glory, crowned and brightened by the pride Of uprising children's children," Rabbi Benjamin replied.

"To have won the praise of nations, to have worn the crown of fame," Rabbi Solomon responded, faithful to his kingly name.

"To sit throned, the lord of millions, first and noblest in the land,"
Replied haughty Rabbi Asher, youngest of the reverend band.

"All in vain," said Rabbi Jairus, "unless faith and hope have traced
In the soul Mosaic precepts, by sin's contact unefaced."

Then uprose wise Rabbi Judah, tallest, gravest of them all:
"From the heights of fame and honor even valiant souls may fall:

"Love may fall us, virtue's sapping grow a dry and thorny rod,
If we fear not in our bosoms the unselfish love of God."

In the outer court sat playing a sad-featured, fair haired child;
His young eyes seemed wells of sorrow—they were God-like when he smiled!

One by one he dropped the lilies, softly plucked with childish hand;
One by one he viewed the sages of that grave and hoary band.

Step by step he neared them closer, till, encircled by the seven,
Thus he said, in tones untrembling, with a smile that breathed of heaven:

"Nay, nay, fathers! only he within the measure of whose breast
Dwells the human love pith God-love can have found life's truest rest:

'For where one is not, the other must grow stagnant at its spring,
Changing good deeds into phantoms—an unmeaning, soulless thing.

"Whose holds this precept truly owns a jewel brighter far
Than the joys of home and children—than wealth, fame, and glory are.

"Father than old age thrice honored, far above tradition's law,
Pure as any radiant vision ever ancient prophet saw.

"Only he within the measure—faith-apportioned—of whose breast Throbs the brother-love with God-love, knows the depth of perfect rest."

Wondering gazed they at each other once in silence, and no more:
"He has spoken words of wisdom no man ever spake before!"

Calmly passing from their presence to the fountain's rippling song,
Stooped he to split the lilies strewn the scattered sprays among.

Faintly stole the sounds of evening through the massive outer door;
Whitely lay the peace of moonlight on the temple's marble floor,

Where the elders lingered, silent, since He spake,—the Undefiled,—
Where the Wisdom of the Ages sat amid the flowers—a child!

SPIRITUAL PHILOSOPHY.

Mrs. Wilcoxson—Christ and His Apostles as Nothing but First Class Mediums.

Mrs. Wilcoxson, the very able and eloquent trance-speaker, has been lecturing in Louisville, Ky. We clip the following from an unfriendly daily paper, the Courier Journal, published in that city, and give it place in our columns to show our readers that despite prejudice and a servile willingness to cater to the popular prejudices of a priest-ridden public, and despite flings and sneering remarks by the secular press, Mrs. Wilcoxson has evidently done herself and the cause of Spiritualism ample justice:

In spite of wind and rain last night, the Spiritualists were out in respectable force at Weisiger Hall to hear the trance-speaker, Mrs. Wilcoxson, on Spiritual Philosophy. Among all the ridiculous artifices for impressing men with the idea that the founders of a new system of morals or religion is speaking by the card, that of going into the trance state is, perhaps, as successful as any. In every other business except that of playing the apostle it is esteemed safest to keep the visual organs well skinned for purposes of successful humbuggery; but when it comes to establishing a great moral system, "going it blind" is thought to be the sure thing. So advancing to the front of the stage, and shutting both eyes, Mrs. Wilcoxson began.

She thought we had a right to investigate and define the ways and the works of God. Man has always been begotten according to well-known laws. Even the child is taught to recognize the claims of that science which teaches the laws of physiology. Priests, says Mrs. W., have imposed on men canonical scripture in God's name that they might hold men in subjection. As to the divinity of Christ, she held that, when we know a child is always begotten of two parents after the well-known laws of physiology, it is impossible to prove that God ever departed from those laws. If theologians contend that there was evidence of the presence of the Holy Ghost in the birth of the Nazarene, she could show that it was likewise present in the birth of John the Baptist and other apostles. She did not repudiate the divinity of Christ. There was the principle of a power in His nature which subordinated and held in subjection, the physical man. And here the speaker went into a glowing description of the grand nature of the humble Nazarene. Illuminating—expansion—sublime pre-eminence—fairly pinnacling in the clouds of high-flying rhetoric the snowy scales of metaphysical metaphors. Christ was pre-eminently quickened and illuminated at birth. She accounted for his high "Spiritual gifts" by the impression made on his mind while yet unborn. Both the mother of John and of Christ held communion with the angels. His prophecy impressed them, and imparted to their children their high spiritual natures. The mother believing all this—the great destiny of her child, served to endow that child with the most sublime nature. A mother on the field of battle, during the period of gestation, lifted up by the clarion notes of victory in the battle-hour, would so impart the spirit of the occasion to her unborn child that a Napoleon would be the result. Those men who have become prominent can trace the fact to fortunate conditions of birth, in many instances. On this branch of the subject the speaker agreed with Fowler's theory exactly.

She accepted the history of Christ as written: but he never claimed to be a God—he was none. In short, her theory is that he was but a first-class medium, highly endowed, like many of the present day. Begotten of angelic influences, he began at an early age to confound the doctors. But in his physical nature he was like other men. True, it is said he walked on water, and was obeyed by the winds, but to what earthly circumstance are silent. His mother and to fly with him from Herod, like other children. He was finally crucified like a mortal. "Why not save himself?" If he had been a very God, why was it not verified at these critical periods? Then in what way did his divinity serve him? His was a high toned spiritual nature. His "magnetic powers" healed the sick; and in His clairvoyant state could tell the Samaritan woman's history. These were alone spiritual gifts, and differed from others only in a higher exercise of those gifts. He was a man of truth, philanthropy, good-will. He said to His disciples, "I go to prepare a place for you."

If he were so upright and truthful, he certainly possessed something more than mortal endowments to be able to go and prepare a place, etc. According to the speaker's character of Him, it is impossible He could have deceived His followers, which He must have done, unless He indeed prepared a place for them. But these little discrepancies Mrs. W. did not stop to explain.

Mrs. Wilcoxson went on at considerable length in the trance state, until finally her eyes flew open with a bang—like a steel-trap—when she took her seat. Mr. Spurrier followed, announcing a seance in the small hall of Weisiger for next Friday evening at 7½ o'clock, and another for the children on Saturday.

Mrs. W. again rose, this time with both eyes wide open, and fire in them too, as not trusting to the trance-state for such serious business, to "go for" Dr. Stuart Robinson and the Ledger reporter of his late sermon. The 2nd chapter and 20th verse of Revelations had been applied to her, and other ladies who speak in public on the stage, and her modesty had been criticised. She very much doubted whether her critics had any modesty to spare; but as for being a Jezebel, why, she dared the doctor to meet her in public debate, and she could tell some wholesome truths. She said she had sent him a copy of the following letter, which she then proceeded to read:

"DR. ROBINSON—Sir: Having seen a report of your very Christ-like (?) and courteous (?) treatment of the speakers of my sex in the various departments of society—and more especially by your reference to 'crowded audiences in Weisiger Hall,' in this city—thus implying that those female speakers or preachers who are employed by the Spiritualists are the "Jezebels" against whom you launch your charges of wickedness—I take this opportunity to challenge you to a fair discussion of the character and morality of orthodox preachers and all their so-called inspired and good men of the Jewish and Christian Church up to the present hour, as compared with the morality and goodness of all those whom you so sweepingly call 'Jezebels' of the present day. This term, per Webster, is "an impudent, daring, and vicious woman." Do you, as a Christian minister and exemplar in society, presume to use such names as applied to the noble women of this country, who by their ability and refined teachings can call before them in Weisiger Hall, of this city, the same as in other cities, a fine, well-bred and intelligent "crowd" as can be found. Do you pretend to assail us and our audiences in this manner—and then dare to claim any 'modesty' whatever? As it is possible for me, with my present engagements, to meet you on the above challenge except by letter, I hereby invite you to a weekly correspondence through the columns of some paper, in which we will compare notes upon this important question. But, sir, should you make any false charges and stoop to slander, you shall agree, in the preliminaries, to pay us one thousand dollars for every such false charge, and be treated to a Scriptural sentence. See New Testament on false witness, slander, lying, etc.

"I will agree to go to the ancient statute book, called Canonical, for testimony of the character of Moses, David, Solomon, etc., and will quote from the pages of history and modern journalism concerning the character of priests in all ages, and for the pitiable excesses and crimes of such men as E. K. Avery, accused of the murder of Sarah Corning; of John Moffit, the great revivalist and rake; of Rev. Lindley, the child-whipper and murderer; of Rev. Mr. Smith, the so-called wife-drowner; of Rev. Mr. Packard, who, by intrigue and cruelty, incarcerated his wife in the insane asylum of Jacksonville, Illinois, for three years—not for insanity, but because she was smarter and a better Bible logician than he was. If you desire to continue the discussion, I will give you, from already published accounts of clerical defection, a script that will destroy your appetite for that kind of controversy—to elevate you to a more chivalrous and gallant defense of your pulpit and clerical duties. Sincerely, and ever undauntedly for the right.

STRANGE PHENOMENA.

Wonderful Doings in Clarke, County, Ill.

At this age of the world, the public is not expected to give credence to every ghost story and haunted house report in circulation; but we have just received from a reliable source, the details of some very singular manifestations that have been witnessed for some time past in the neighborhood of Mill Creek, about four miles north from York, Illinois. Those who are inclined to doubt the truth of these statements, have only to consult fifteen or twenty families in that vicinity, or open a correspondence with some of the parties named, for additional proof of the validity of this story.

The first manifestation of this chain of supernal events took place several days ago at the house of John Haddox, and after many strange and apparently impossible phenomena had been witnessed, a series of like performances was opened at the residence of the Widow Haddox, a sister-in-law and neighbor of John Haddox. Tables, chairs, beds, and all articles of furniture, were tumbled about in the most reckless manner. Dishes, fruit jars, and all articles capable of being moved, were misplaced and often broken and destroyed. Members of the family frequently received blows from flying articles, and everything was kept in a constant state of agitation. On one occasion the head of a little boy terminated the flight of a small article which inflicted a very severe and painful wound. Knives and forks flew out of the cupboard drawer, the drawer remaining closed. Rocks, clubs, pieces of coal, and all kinds of movable articles, were hurled about by some unseen and mysterious power. Some parties carried away the marks of clubs and rocks, thrown by his (or her) ghostship. A lady's shawl was picked up in a remote part of the house, thrown into the fire and burned up. A number of eggs had been stored away in a small drawer for several days, and on opening the drawer, were found to be all broken to pieces. Everything capable of being injured or removed is reported unsafe.

These are only a few of the results of these strange manifestations, which differ from those usually related, in the fact that they have actually been seen in daylight as is testified by numerous reliable witnesses. Persons from all parts of the country go to Mill Creek to see the "ghosts" and numerous efforts have been made to ascertain the causes of the wonderful phenomena, and a certain old lady of the neighborhood was at one time decided to be a witch and responsible for all the excitement. Certain parties talked of lynching and hanging the unfortunate creature but she stoutly denied all knowledge of the disturbance, and was not molested. Further developments are feared but more are especially desired.

It seems, according to reports current in the neighborhood that the wife of John Haddox died about a year ago and that on her death bed she declared that she would return and haunt him, if spirits were permitted to return to earth, in case he ever employed a certain woman in the neighborhood to keep house for him. A few days since he took this woman to his house, and then the strange performances mentioned above began.

A STRANGE CASE.

A Dead Mother Visits her Living Child, Sits at its Cradle and Caresses it.

RICHMOND, Jan. 23, 1871.—A strange story is current in certain circles here. About two years ago, Mr. A. married. In due time he became a father, but his wife died when the child was a few months old. On her death bed she exhibited intense anxiety as to the little one she was to leave behind her, and earnestly besought her husband to confide it, after her death, to the care of one of her relatives. He promised, and I believe, did for a while let the child stay in charge of the person whom the mother had designated. Some weeks ago, however, Mr. A. again married, and at once reclaimed the child, who had not learned to speak a word, and was unable even to crawl. One day, this child was left alone for a few moments in its stepmother's bed-room, lying in a crib or cradle some distance from the bed. When Mrs. A. returned, she was amazed to see the child smiling and crowing upon the middle of the bed. In her astonishment, she involuntarily asked;

"Who put you there, baby?

"Mamma!" distinctly responded the child that had never before spoken a word.

On a strict inquiry throughout the household it was found that none of the family had been in the room during Mrs. A's brief absence from it. This it is solemnly averred, was but the beginning of a series of spiritual visitations from the dead mother. Whenever the child was left alone it could be heard to laugh and crow as if delighted by the fondlings and endearments of some one, and on these occasions it was frequently found to have changed its dress, position, etc., in a manner quite beyond its own unaided capacity. Finally, as the account is, the first Mrs. A. appeared one night recently at the bedside of Mr. A. and his second wife, and earnestly entreated that her darling should be restored to the relative whom she had indicated as the guardian of the child on her death-bed. The apparition, which, it is declared, was distinctly seen and heard by both Mr. A. and his wife, promised to haunt them no more if her wish was complied with. Both Mr. A. and his wife were too much awe-stricken to reply; but the next day the child was carried back as directed by the ghostly visitant. Such is the story as seriously avouched by the principal parties concerned, who are most respectable and intelligent people, and no Spiritualists—Cor. Cincinnati Commercial.

A Wonderful Ghost Story.

It is told that an engineer on a Tennessee night train has recently, on several occasions, discovered a red light swinging at a furious rate near a station where the train stops for water. The light would sometimes be in front and sometimes in the rear of the train. When the engineer would stop his train and send some one to learn why the signal to brake up was made, the messenger would be greatly surprised to see the light vanish. Investigation has proved that no person was there with a lantern, and the brakemen and conductor concur also in having beheld the phenomena, which, so far as known, is without visible cause, though it is alleged that a year or two ago a signal man was killed near the point named.

On another occasion, some laborers on the same line were coming down the road in the hand car, about 3 o'clock in the morning, when they suddenly heard the approach of an engine and train, and hearing that no train was due in the vicinity at that hour, they became frightened, and, jumping out of the car, threw it off to avoid a collision. They had hardly accomplished this, when a train swept by, presenting a spectacle more appalling than the apocalyptic picture on the pale horse. The phantom engineer stood with his ghastly hand on the throttle valve, and his sockетless eyes peering in the darkness ahead; the pale and ghostly fireman was in his place; skeleton brakemen were on the platforms, while through the lurid and gleaming windows of the coaches could be seen the ghastly features of passengers who had long since made their last trip in the flesh, and handed in their checks.

As the spectre train sped on, suddenly the whistle sounded "down brakes!" a sound such as no mortal contrivance ever made. This was immediately followed by what seemed a terrific crash, accompanied by mingled shrieks and groans, and all the terrible concomitants of a first-class railroad accident. The poor, horrified laborers immediately fled the spot, and, believing as they do that the line is haunted, nothing could induce one of them ever to work on it again.

A Superb Painting.

Mr. N. B. Star, of this city, has just completed for the Spiritualist Society, a painting, which has been entitled, "Evening in the Isles of the Blest." It is a picture four feet by seven and a half in size, purporting to be a representation of the hanging gardens of the spirit world and the shores of the beautiful sea. There is nothing complicated nor over-wrought about it, for the design of the work is simple, chaste, and striking in the extreme, and therein lies the difficulty in describing it properly in words.

In the foreground on the right is a beautiful garden, displaying such luxuriant shrubbery and brilliant flowers as are found in the tropical climes of the earth, and the whole picture is pervaded with the soft aspect of the South. On the left, a tall, graceful palm rises above the smaller trees around it, standing in bold relief against a sky tinged with the soft, warm color left by the setting sun. Further on, the placid waters of the sea, reflecting in their calm depths the various hues of the sky and shore, stretch away to a distant headland. On the shore to the right are the snow-white, symmetrical columns supporting the hanging gardens. From these gardens graceful flights of steps lead down to the water, and into the garden first mentioned, where a marble fountain is throwing up its crystal jets. Near the head of the sea, resting lightly upon the water, is a boat, from which a white-robed figure is just rising, and beyond all this stretches away the entrancing perspective of sea, and sky, and shore, all tinged with a roseate atmosphere beautiful beyond description. On the distant shore, dimly defined from afar, are other gardens and palaces. Over all bends a sky, blending the soft, dreamy, languid colors of southern climes on earth with the immortal hues of Heaven.

An art critic has said that the perfection of art is attained when, looking at the picture, we forget the painter, and, every thing else but nature. And looking at this matchless creation, we insensibly forget that it is the handiwork of a feeble old man, sixty-six years of age, who has lived a life of mechanical toil, at a most unpoetical trade, who has never had access to the schools of art and design, the works of the old masters, or any of the sources of instruction that are deemed indispensable to the acquirement of that skill which transfers to canvas in faceless beauty the scenery of Earth and Heaven, and think only of the lovely view before us, and the Paradise that blooms for mortals on the "immortal shore."

We have two of Bro. Star's paintings on exhibition at our Reception Rooms. Friends are respectfully invited to call and see them at their convenience.—ED. JOURNAL.

The Food We Eat.

We have, in the different varieties of food we eat, the phosphates, the nitrates, and the carbonates. The first make brain and bone; the second makes nerve and muscle; the last makes fat. By an analysis of the leading articles of food, we have the following result:

	Phos. parts.	Nit. parts.	Carb. Parts.
Beef, lean	2	15	20
Mutton	2	12	40
Lamb	2	12	35
Pork	2	10	60
Veal	2	16	16
Salmon	2	20	10
Oysters	2	10	10
Codfish	2	14	5
Eggs	2	16	6
Wheat	2	15	69
Rye	2	12	72
Corn	1	12	72
Buckwheat	1	8	15
Barley	3	17	10
Oats	3	17	66
Beans	4	24	57
Peas	4	22	60
Rice	1	6	80
Potatoes	1	2	22
Turnips	1	1	21
Cabbage	3	20	16
Butter	0	0	100

By the last, one may see that he can eat a firkin of butter and never get a thought. It, however, answers a good purpose, and supplies plenty of carbon. The thinker or poet could not draw inspiration from a bin of potatoes or a barrel of pork. When brain force is required, brain food should be eaten. When physical labor is to be performed, the food that makes nerve and muscle is to be preferred. In cold weather, food that supplies carbon should be taken, but less in hot weather. In April and May, but little animal food should be taken. A mixed diet is best, neither drawing nourishment entirely from the animal or the vegetable kingdom. We think children under fourteen years should not not be allowed to eat meat at all. "Milk for baby—strong meat for men."

LITERARY

Our Young Folks, for April, has its usual attractive stories and essays, illustrating science, history, and morals in an agreeable and instructive manner for young or old.

The Atlantic, for April, has among other very readable articles, the Fourth Series of "Our Whispering Gallery;" "Castilian Days," by JOHN HAY; "Our Eyes, and How to Take Care of them," by H. W. WILLIAMS, M.D.; "American Life in France."

The Eclectic, for April, comes to us, as usual, with a varied and attractive table of contents. Its leading article is an Essay on Philosophy, Psychology, and Metaphysics. The magazine also contains the best engraving of Gambetta we have yet seen.

The Phrenological Journal and Life Illustrated, for April, appears in its usual becoming dress, and contains an excellent variety of reading matter, with several portraits. We would instance: Misses Nilsson and Demerest, with portraits, Henry Burden and Elias P. Needham, two Inventors of the day.

The Firesails Friend is received, and the second number fully sustains the interest created by the first. Under the able editorial management of Dr. Van Namee, it will always be very readable and a welcome guest in every circle it reaches. R. Leonidas Hamilton, publisher, 520 Fourth Avenue, New York.

Religious Meditations, and Other Poems—Liberal, Reformatory and Miscellaneous, is a neat little book by C. L. JAMES, author of "Law of Marriage," &c. The author is a finished scholar, and thinks deeply. His modest little book is full of original thought, and will repay reading. Price, 50 cents. Address, Louisana, Mo.

Letter from W. P. Byler.

"Who are they?" I have been one since Jan. 1st, 1871. I should have written sooner, but I kept thinking I would have some money in a few days, and put off writing, until I am ashamed to delay any longer. I would as soon be without any thing to eat on Sunday as to be without the JOURNAL. I am poor, but not poor enough to read the JOURNAL for nothing. I will pay for it, though it be one dollar at a time, and live on in hopes that I will soon be able to pay three dollars in a lump. Find inclosed $1.00 to pay on my subscription for renewal; and one dollar for J. W. Pile—renewal. In order to somewhat compensate you for sending me the JOURNAL on a credit, I have taken some pains to get a few subscribers. Inclosed find $2 50 for five new trial subscribers.

Tonganoxie, Leavenworth Co. Kansas.

Thank you, brother. If all will do as you are doing in procuring subscribers, we shall have a fine list right speedily.—ED. JOURNAL.

☞ We are advised that the bishop at Millville instructed his flock not to give their work to the only shoemaker in the place, because he was not of the fold. The bishop said that he mortally hated to see this outsider carrying home the flour of the Saints. Flour, we presume, is scarce in Millville; but if this report be true, it is more plentiful than bishop Pitkin's charity. Bishop Pitkin is generally reported to be a good, kind man; and it is a pity that his religious faith should spoil his better nature.—Salt Lake Tribune.

SPIRITUALISM AND SORCERY.

By Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson.

For a long time we have waited, hoping that abler pens than ours would give us the information and counsel we so much need in the present unfoldment of our living gospel. But it seems to be reserved to us to throw our feeble light upon some of the dark mysteries of progression, and clear up, as far as possible, the entanglements of this, our finite and imperfect growth. Hitherto, the chaos and uncertainty of revelation has never been fairly explained.

If the ancients agreed to accept as oracular, a Moses or a Solomon, they seem never to have thought that the coming generations would analyze the character of those oracles, with strict reference to their influence upon the life and growth of society. If, at a later time, and in agreement with the growth of philosophy, men agreed to accept the claims of a Jesus and his disciples, it would seem that they at once consigned to dust up the lively oracles in the care of St. Peter, and deny all further exercise of spiritual gifts, as blasphemy against the true Christ. If a Luther was bold enough and progressive enough to defy the thunders of the Vatican, he took good care that he did not endorse any discovery which did not come through his glass. If Swedenborg proved himself a seer and medium of intercourse with the spirit world, he took all possible pains to prevent all others from following him to the exhibition.

In every case of accepted revelation, it has been thundered from the high court of Priestdom that it was blasphemous, presumptuous, criminal and dangerous to go beyond the verdict of the court. To that court, the people of their several nationalities—the people, from whom the oracles were called, have never been appointed, either as judge or jury. A self elected autocracy has always built its holy sanctuary in the new age or revelation, and none but the favored expounders thereof, by virtue of an ecclesiastical oath, could be permitted to disseminate its choice bits of revelation on the ground that they were final and complete.

This disposition on the part of men to assume authority in matters of conscience, has not, as we perceive, been based upon the purity of revelation, but rather upon the impurity and danger of holding converse with unseen intelligences. As far as the canonical New Testament is any account of the Nazarene, it is true, we find no such opposition in his reported words, to the practice of spiritual intercourse and the exercise of healing gifts, but no sooner were his disciples sent out, than they returned, saying, "Master, we found one casting out devils, and we forbade him, because he followed not with us,"—whereupon the Teacher rebuked them, and approved, independent of title or claim, the person alluded to.

If there is anything particularly striking or superior in the life of the Nazarene, it is the recognition of the universal divinity in man, irrespective of any particular creed or party, and his unshaken devotion to a principle which he made free to all. He would be invidious, to show the reasons of forgiveness and mercy, to point to the cursing of the fig-tree, as many materialists do, and some Spiritualists as well—in evidence of a foolish temper—for it may be true, and it only not—as to show that the greatest of men have in their human moods, said and done far more foolish things than to curse an unfruitful fig-tree. If they do not too often came with far more venom their fellow mortals, were mistaken? Is it not the every day professor of religion to swear loudly at potatoes—and "small potatoes" at that. This habit of swearing at something, somebody and everything—everybody, in some sort of vernacular, either polite or vulgar, is as old as the race itself, and much older than Holy Writ.

There must of necessity be something to receive our fault-finding, and some door of escape by which we enter heaven, and leave our sins on the head of some scape-goat.

So every illuminated mind is passed along as divested of all imperfection, and the inspired founder of every new faith becomes immaculate in wisdom, and final in revelation, with the adherents of that religion in the nineteenth century, as in the nineteenth century, we have a rehash of all this. Every party seeking a fame on earth, lifts the name of some leader, whose writings and sayings are, par excellence, the only perfect revelation.

Some have taken to a sort of semi-orthodoxy or Calvinism—others to a semi-Swedenborgianism. They have gone to the ninety ninth heaven, and found the ninety-ninth hell just opposite to it. They have been selected as the bearer of despatches to this poor, blind, halt and lame world. They are quite sure that none but themselves have ever got a glimpse of God's eternal truth, under such special interposition of the celestials. They are just as sure they must build up a church or society to promulgate their pet revelation, as Mahomet or Joe Smith was. The whole object of the outlay shall be proselytism to their pet faith. And we always notice that such minds are mostly theoretical—seldom practical. They have a perfect machinery for turning out salvation—and the same pendulum swings to its opposite and corresponding point, which is damnation. It is always with such people, "Believe or be damned." And what the priest utters from the pulpit—the ambitious leader repeats from his platform.

It seems so universally the practice to either snare, or perforce of obloquy and scorn, to drive timid and peace loving souls into the old slaughter house of human liberty! What is the old cry of their day of power; what Mahommedans did in theirs, and what every narrow, bigoted and sectarian authority has done, from Moses to Constantine, and from John Calvin to Cotton Mather, must, by virtue of descent, the taint of blood, the law and rule of pure selfishness and love of tyranny, stick out of the old soil from which it grew, and even creep around the strong columns of our spiritual temple.

Of course, then, we must have our claimants for office and authority. And upon every hand we find them—a class who can no longer be instructed, or fed from the ordinary communion tables. They have been installed in the inner department; the "superior department." They do not have any spirits about them but the immaculate worthies of that ninety-ninth heaven. They have not exactly been upon the mountain, but their oracle has, and from his hand they have received the final revelation—the table of the law. But, in their view, the people are still all idolaters—with the exception of the little few who have meekly said "amen," when the oracle spake.

We recently met one of these converts to a semi-Swedenborgian Spiritualism, and could not for our life divine how any one drawn into the investigation of Spiritualism, could, at this late day, hitch it to the old, lumbering, crumbling institution of orthodoxy. For this "convert," otherwise quite an intelligent man, could see nothing but the same grand division of "good" and "evil" spirits, which is to be found in the Calvinistic system, with this difference, viz., that all these imps of crime and darkness are left to perfect their evil natures to all eternity, with the broadest kind of range—and the only thing the pious can do as a preventive, is to wrap their timid souls in the robes of self righteousness, and keep to their heaven of self-conceit.

We often wonder how these poor pharisees must look to the angels of their heaven, and "how the fiends grow wild with laughter," sometimes, at the ridiculous garbs these saintly professors assume.

That Spiritualism can serve as a highway of travel to people of all shades of belief, detracts not from its real virtue, and that the solid structure, like a strong and massive bridge, is not weakened by such freight, we will assume in the course of our deliberations. Therefore, these stereotyped ejaculations of "evil spirits," "dark spirits," "low spirits," "dangerous," "bad influences," etc., must fall upon the philosophical ear with comparatively little effect.

We trust that some day the race will travel smoothly over the solid foundations of progress, and instead of always running with eyes aglare, and long corpse spines, from some imaginary devil at their heels, it will take a more sensible way of getting into heaven.

Recently we met a case where we were invited to lecture, but in order to propitiate the gods, and keep away the devils, alias "evil spirits," all our plans, our wants, etc., must be submitted to the local oracles, number 1, 2, 3, etc., before our otherwise very worthy and zealous assistant would do anything, even of the commonest order of preparation.

Now, between Swedenborgian Spiritualism, and this every day "familiarity," as Brother Davis terms it, there spreads before us an immense field of investigation, and it is doubtful, at this stage of the deliberations, which extreme is one of most weakness, or, as croakers, say, of most "danger." If we get up to the immaculate, ethereal, celestial and divine spheres of glory, where only the double chosen elect of "election" are fit for the super extraordinary ceremonial of baptizing us—how can we ever, in our wonderful flights of purity and progress, be exposed to the retrograde motion of coming down again?

How can it be supposed that we, so exalted and favored, should ever again hold any intimate relation to the great majority of mankind, living so far "beneath us?"

On the other hand, if we become so lost to the authority of the decalogue as to take to ourselves "familiar spirits," and ignore the oracle of the "ninety ninth heaven," we shall, in the estimation of that oracle, sink just exactly to the ninety-ninth hell. According to exact science, then, the science of degrees, it is easy for every Pharisee to be by profession, Swedenborgian, Calvinistic, Orthodox or Spiritualist, to locate his hell, put all disenters into it, and turn the key upon the offenders. How convenient! And how satisfactory this imaginary final verdict to the self righteous Pharisee!

We are very much inclined to think the general order of the heavens will remain terrestrially the same, the grass will continue to grow, the seasons to return in their order, and the regular pulsations of nature to proceed as usual.

With all this contention of opinion, there claims a superiority, the volume of divine revelation holds up to our gaze the same eternal record from day to day, from year to year; nor can we find when or where, saint, sybil, god or devil, man or his oracles have ever changed it! Both the broad day side and the dark side of the Nature are there equally and fairly depicted. The minutest atom holds its place equally with yon unmeasured universe. Saints, satyrs, devils, etc., if they exist at all, are there, a part and parcel of that universe, and perhaps no more in the divine order of things, nor less, than the atom which drifts along in the grand revolutions of time, as securely held to its legitimate destiny as the empire of which it is a part.

What relation, then, does pure and perfect, or undefiled Spiritualism hold to the realm of sorcery? Let us see.

ASTROLOGY.

By Prof. W. H. Chaney.

NUMBER THREE.

When I wrote my first article on this subject I had no thought of submitting a series of papers. Numerous letters of inquiry called forth my second, which I supposed to be my last. Now, the "Chapter on Modern Astrology," in the Atlantic Monthly, moves me to resume the subject, which must really be my last for the present, for the demands upon my time are very great, and I am laboring beyond my strength.

Astrology is pure science, and its rules are learned the same as those of mathematics. These may be mastered by any person who has mastered mathematics. Yet there are very many persons who may learn to cast a horoscope, and calculate all the arcs of direction, yet always remain dunces in the occult art of reading the horoscope. This ability is a sort of gift, intuitional in its nature, and cannot be taught. I mean the ability to read with one-fourth the nicety of detail such as is ascribed to Dr. Stone, in the "Chapter" under consideration. I will illustrate by relating some of my experience.

Mrs. Merwin, of New York city, has Venus for her significator. Beautiful herself, all her tastes are of the most refined and delicate order. She is highly accomplished in all that pertains to fashionable feminine excellence, but so destitute of mathematical ability that I experienced great difficulty in teaching her compound addition and subtraction. I gave her lessons in Astrology during a period of nearly two years, and she is now able to read a horoscope quite accurately, having often surprised me by discovering results which I considered beyond her comprehension. But it is impossible for her to ever learn to measure the arcs of direction, for predicting certain events. She is a Spiritualist, mediumistic, and a very dear friend of Emma Hardinge.

There is a gentleman in Philadelphia, of fine classical education, thoroughly learned in mathematics, capable of measuring any given arc, but wholly incapable of learning to read a horoscope.

A lady in New York, whose name I would give, but have forgotten, step-daughter of that good man and eminent Spiritualist, Dr. Hallock, took lessons from me in Astrology for a short time. She possesses excellent mediumistic powers, but exercises them only in the family circle, or among intimate friends. At the third or fourth lesson I took occasion to explain her own horoscope, in the doing of which I committed an important error. That evening, while alone in her room, her hand was influenced to write a correction of my error, and at the same time give some valuable information, such as I should expect to come only from an old professor of the science, as no doubt it did. This lady is also denoted by Venus, and possesses all the beauty of form, loveliness of character and purity of heart which Venus always gives when free from affliction and debility. She was constantly surprising me by suggesting thoughts in advance of my own.

I have been frequently informed through mediums, that unless spirits understand the stellar science, they are not much better at predicting the future than mortals. Spirits often apply to the spirits of astrologers, in order that they may predict correctly for their friends on earth. But there are many who guess at the future, believing that Astrology is only a pretense, for I have found spirits just as angular, bigoted and obstinate as mortals.

The authors mentioned as having been consulted by Dr. Stone, are not known to me as authors on Astrology. The first two were merely "diviners," "practicers of magic, etc." Paracelsus was a wandering emperic, the first to introduce minerals and other poisons into medical practice, indirectly aiming a death-blow at Astrology. Hyperion said Galen was a man who planted roots and herbs in their practice. Every remedial agent was classified under the planets, and gathered at specified times. Under the botanic system every respectable physician understood Astrology. The term "quack," was first applied to Paracelsus and his disciples, as a distinctive title, because they made use of so much quicksilver, which the Germans pronounced broad—"quacksilber." It is now applied in derision to all who do not use mercury and poisons in medical practice. Paracelsus professed to have discovered the "elixir of life," wherein if a man drank he would live forever, yet he died at the early age of forty-three, a wandering vagabond, with a bottle of his elixir in his pocket.

Magic has been practiced from time immemorial. It was of two kinds: "white magic," a system of divining through the agency of good spirits, and "black magic," hence, "black art," for doing the same through evil spirits. The "spell" or incantation was wrought by means of certain absurd ceremonies, concluding by the solemn utterance of some omnific word or words. Chief among these was, ABRACADABRA. All these practices were simply "ancient Spiritualism," the ceremonies operating to place the professors (mediums) in a passive condition, so that the spirits were able to manifest.

Our word "Gospel" is a contraction and union of the two Anglo-Saxon words — God, spel. Webster dodges in defining it, by saying that spel means history. I think he knew better, for he defines spell correctly, which is precisely the same word. But Webster had a wholesome fear of the churches before his eyes, as he did in defining "baptize" or "baptism." We can now understand how Christ and his disciples are represented as practicing (or preaching) the gospel. It was simply a "spell;" it was "white magic;" it was SPIRITUALISM. They repudiated Abracadabra, and declared that there was no other name given save JESUS CHRIST whereby men could be saved, that is, work the "spell," cast out devils, etc.

Yet this whole story about such an individual as Jesus Christ is an astronomical allegory, centuries older than the New Testament, which I hold myself in readiness to maintain, against all disputants, with either tongue or pen.

For centuries Astrology has been confounded with divination, and yet they are no more alike than a yard of lace and a barrel of soft soap. Ignorant impostors who pretend to "tell fortunes," are advertised as astrologers, and yet not one of them can define the difference between the parallax of a star and the precession of the equinoxes. Thus Astrology suffers and it is impeded on every hand. In view of all these discouragements, a man must have some courage to publicly announce himself the friend of, or even a believer in, the starry science.

It is evident to me that Dr. Stone was a medium possessed of wonderful powers, and selected by the spirits of ancient astrologers as their mouthpiece. This will appear by observing a few of the facts detailed. First, to "cast a figure," (this must have been an "horary figure," since no time of birth is mentioned), and read it, cost him a sleepless night, causing him to appear pale and indisposed the following morning. Now, half an hour is abundant time for an horary figure, which requires no deep calculations.

Second, he gave an exactness of detail such as is entirely unknown to the science. William Lilly is admitted to have been the most thorough master of horary Astrology known. He predicted the "great plague," and "great London fire," fifteen years before their occurrence. After the fire, Lilly was summoned before a committee appointed by the House of Commons "to answer such questions as shall be then and there asked him." Among the questions propounded by Sir Robert Brooke was one as to the cause of the great fire, to which he replied: "I have taken much pains in the search thereof, but can not, or would not, give myself any the least satisfaction therein." Since Lilly was unable to solve such an apparently easy question by the astral science, it is, therefore, evident that Dr. Stone was aided by some other power, while his paleness and sleepless nights point to clairvoyance or mediumship.

I incline to the opinion that Dr. Stone knew but little of real Astrology, for although all the work which I have examined upon magic have more to say about the planets, I find the planets are used principally for a system of divining, regardless of their magnetic influence. Thus it is with the Arabs and Persians, although their ancestors understood the science in its purity. So, too, of the Egyptians; yet Claudius Ptolemy, who lived nearly two thousand years ago, is received and quoted to-day as standard authority on planetary influence.

"Heathen mythology," like our Bible, so absurd in a literal sense, is simply a collection of "Astronomical Allegories," and when rightly interpreted is the very sublimity of poetry and science, far surpassing the finest productions of the moderns. Our Bible is of the same character, yet in many points inferior. Neither is original, but both are modified copies from remote antiquity, and so far as I have been able to observe, every modification detracts from the strength and beauty of the original.

THE WAR ON MEDIUMS.

By Rev. D. W. Hull.

During the past winter we have had evidences of a regular, organized effort to suppress Spiritualism in every phase.

They first arrested Mrs. Lottie Fowler, at Bridgeport, Connecticut, for the crime of giving warning of the ill-fated cartridge factory explosion, in time to save some hundreds of lives; but it fortunately happened that the decision of the court was more righteous than the malice of the weazen-faced saints, and she was cleared.

And then the miserable excuse who presides over the destinies of the Chicago Tribune, inserted his ecclesiastical proboscis where he was sure heresy could be smelt, if not felt and seen. The result of this theological sniff, was the arrest of several mediums, all of whom were cleared except two, who were fined ten dollars each, just to keep the dear gospel babes still, and, after quieting their noise with a sugar teat, the fines were rescinded.

Apropos to the appearance of the latter fact in the papers, my perigrinations brought me up in Warren, R. I., where the red hand of persecution was raised against Spiritualism. In the local paper I found the following paragraph, which the writer lacked the manhood to sign his name to:

"Even among this community are to be found some of the disciples of a modern-antiquism, condemning the Scriptures, discarding every accepted theological tenet, they substitute nothing but a belief in the interposition of "Spirits" (i. e. the spiritual natures of deceased human beings) in the affairs of mankind. Although rumor runs rife, with reports of the most absurd performances at their seances, yet so long as these people confined themselves to the cheerful and exhilarating practices necessarily involved in the exposition of their faith, no one desired to interfere; but now it is said that a human life has been sacrificed to their superstition! We are unable to say whether this be true or not but at any rate the public have a right to demand an explanation. The circumstances as reported to us are as follows:

"The wife of a Spiritualist fell sick with the lung fever; a Spiritualist doctress was sent for, who simply manipulated the sick woman awhile, muttered a few incantations over her, and then pronounced her cured, and wound up with advising her to take a dose of ham and eggs to settle her stomach. As a result the poor woman died, the victim of nothing less than a crime if the story be true. Now the moral sense of this community will never tolerate such an outrage on civilization to be repeated here."

The facts of the case are, that during the past two years, the lady has been suffering from consumption. She passed away last Tuesday, March 14th. She did eat about two slices of ham and not quite half an egg the day before she died. It being cooked on purpose for her at her request; and she did refuse to have a doctor or a clergyman visit her sick chamber, which she certainly had a right to do, and as every intelligent Spiritualist will do, when they realize that mineral poison scientifically administered is on a par with the hypocritical canting of the clergy. Her mistake, if she made any, was in not employing the services of a clairvoyant physician.

It is to be hoped that the writer of the above feels better, now that he has vented his spleen, and uttered his pious falsehoods and calumnies, under a sacred respect he has to Almighty God; but the meanness of the little soul, is the most prominent part of his person. Every line of the above paragraph is addressed to the basest passions of the most ignorant and unlearned of the community. We see the shape of the adder, and we are full well aware that he only wants the power to fasten his poisonous fangs in society, and drive every man or woman to his theological notions or to the scaffold.

The heading of the article, "Human Sacrifices," was intended to inflame the passions and arouse an unreasoning mob, who would be beyond the reach of law and order. If they once succeeded in making their brute dupes believe that Spiritualists were killing a victim, every now and then, they will have gained their point, and will need no further legislation to carry out their pet schemes.

All this is the verification of predictions of Spirits for the past several years. They have told us that there is a secret understanding between all the leading theologians of the day to make an organized effort to break up liberal thought all over the country. The simultaneous action of the opposers of Spiritualism in several places, is a verification of the truth of these communications.

They also told us that this warfare would commence by the persecutions of mediums, and that is commencing. But the end is not yet, For four or five years this war will grow hotter and hotter, till victory perches upon the banners of the friends of humanity. So, friends, we must anticipate the future. The efforts now being made to suppress liberal thoughts, are only the low muttering thunders of the coming storm.

And while all this is about to be enacted, shall we remain silent or indifferent to the wants of those who bear our burdens for us? Oh, stand up and protect the mediums by your influence and means; join hands and unite; support lecturers in your places as often as your means will allow; buy books and scatter them here and there, where they will be read and thought, will take root and germinate. Let us organize for the mutual protection of each other, and may the name of him who shall desert his post in this trying hour of our trial, be covered with infamy.

I am glad to notice so many medium's and speaker's conventions. There is to be one in Decatur, Ill., in June, and as there are to be several resolute spirits there, we may look out for a great deal of thunder, and some lightning, from that quarter. We advise the Tribune to send their reporters there and watch close, for we shall furnish them food for at least a dozen sensational articles.

One more word and I am done. "We are going to fight it out on this line" if it takes all our life-time to do it, and we call upon the clergy to meet us in discussion, and prove to the world that we are wrong and they are right. Their savage mode of warfare, of firing from among the bushes and retreating, is neither honorable nor brave, and their posterity will ever be branded as the children of cowards.

THE LAWS OF SPIRIT COMMUNION.

By D. P. Kayner, M. D.

That the laws governing mediumship and spirit control, are but little understood, is a self-evident fact, hence, earnest and would-be honest investigators, are often led to denounce the best conceived and most intended mediums, as humbugs and impostors, when if they themselves had better understood the conditions, and law governing under those conditions, they would at once have acquitted the medium of all blame in the matter. That such was the case with Bro. Foster, upon whom the report of Bro. Kinney cast such severe reflections, we think can be satisfactorily shown.

On the theological premise that "God is a spirit, and seeketh such to worship him as worship in spirit," we deduce the corollary—that man is a spirit—or he could not "worship in spirit."

Again, man thinks—and unlike all other forms of animal life, has power within himself to project his thoughts, out of, or beyond himself. Thoughts then, become living things,—substantial, real, enduring. This is demonstrated daily. Man thinks a piece of mechanism; his thoughts are projected to a diagram,—to a model—to the thing itself, and an achievement in science—or an application of principles and spirit forces in Nature, to practical use, is projected to the world.

The boy Watts, on seeing the steam puffing from the spout of a tea kettle thought—thought the steam engine. Fulton thought the steam boat. Evans and Stephenson thought the locomotive. Thomson thought the traction engine for common roads. Clayton thought of filling the bowl of a common tobacco pipe with bituminous coal, closing it by capping it over with clay, and placing it in the fire; and, igniting the gas escaping from the stem; and Murdock thought of conveying gas along the streets of cities in pipes to light the city from one single point. Franklin thought to make the dangerous thunderbolt, submissive, and Morse to make electricity, subserve the wants of man.

In other fields also have men thought. All departments of science, literature and art are illuminated by thoughts, emanating from the all-pervading, Infinite spirit, working in, and out-working through its individualized human entities.

Spirit thinks.

Spirit is all-pervading and Infinite.

It therefore follows, as a natural sequence, that thought is Infinite,—Infinite in the aggregate—finite, or limited by the capacity of each separate individual entity.

Mind or spirit projects thought.

Thought, then, becomes the active agent or operative manifestation of spirit.

Therefore thought is organized spirit force in operation.

All things are manifestations of spirit in degree.

Spirit is all-pervading and infinite.

Hence spirit is universal,—is omnipresent, omnipotent and omniscient.

All individual forms represent the outworking or growth of spirit, as it gathers to itself the grosser materials of its structure, and builds them into individualized form.

Forms differ according to the inherent forces at work for their projection, and conditions, and circumstances, influencing and surrounding their unfolding.

No two human beings are exactly alike.

No two persons present precisely the same spiritual organization, and mental growth and culture.

Therefore, no two persons will in all things, think and act alike.

Physical and natal conditions, including the physical and mental status of the parents, planetary, or electric and magnetic influences, and the psychological impressions of persons and things, all operate in giving form and impress to the being, and as these would be different in each case, every individual would bear therefrom the stamps of those influences and combinations, which make up their distinctive individuality.

Spirit forces, then, are acting from within and without to inspire growth, and give form and individuality to each object, person or thing. All forms are possessed of a life-force, corresponding to their degree of development; for we lay it down as an axiom of philosophy, that there can be no form without a corresponding life-force, and no life where spirit is not.

There is a law—and that law exists in the spirit forces within the things themselves—pervading atoms, molecules, particles and forms, obeyed alike in the grain of sand, and the mighty planet, revolving in space, in the lowest forms of animal life and in man—the law of reciprocation, through which an interchange of influences is constantly and forever going on. But, as we have seen by virtue of the inherent forces, and surrounding influences, and conditions, forms are made to differ, and as man-kind differ in these particulars, their thoughts will also differ; yet all are related, as effect to cause, to the all pervading infinite spirit, and whether conscious of the fact or not, must reciprocally influence or act upon one another according to their magnetic states, or the spiritual relations of separate unfoldings, and the rapport of their mental impressibilities and susceptibilities.

PRAYER.

By Luna Hutchinson.

The opinions of men in regard to the efficacy and necessity of prayer, are widely different, some believing and advocating constant and stated times of prayer, daily; while others, (and the number is fast increasing), do not think prayer of any use, and that it is powerless to produce any change in our life conditions.

True prayer is a soul emotion not controlled by the will, any more than is the feeling to laugh or to weep; it alone being felt when we are in distress or overjoyed with thankfulness; then our emotions burst forth in prayer or praise, or it may be, by imprecations, the opposite polarity of the mind's devotional faculties.

That prayer does not, neither is intended to change physical laws and conditions, there is little room to doubt; but that it has power to calm soul storms and mental tempests, thousands of prayerful hearts can testify. Even as beautifully set forth in the words of "Absalom," by Willis, when David in his great grief knelt down and prayed by his dead son, then rose up calmly, "as if a strength was given him of God," and composed the pall that hid his loved son forever from his sight. This is done daily, all over the earth, and without this aid, in our present state of knowledge and power, many would sink down under the weight of their sorrows and bereavements.

Words alone, are not prayer, though prayer may be without words; but when it degenerates into mere form, then it no longer serves the soul's needs of being quickened into more spiritual life and clearer perceptions of truth.

The Divine Being can have no more need of our prayers than the sun has need of the fragrance of the flowers which it warms into life with its beams; but, like them, we should open our hearts to the sunlight of divine inspiration, that our lives may send out the blessings and beauty, deeds and good deeds to bless and cheer the world of mankind.

Few minds can be rendered sufficiently calm and composed before an audience to feel the spirit of real prayer; and I see no impropriety in their writing down their invocations, as David did, whose prayers have been used, with little variations, for more than two thousand years; although these are but as an infant's cry from a feeling of need they can not intelligently express; and who shall say that the prayers of Theodore Parker are not dictated as much good as his sermons?

I envy not the man or woman who never prayed, for I can testify that I have entered my closet with heart so burdened with grief that they seemed no strength in me, and have in one half hour's communion with the infinite, come forth rejoicing in songs of gladness.

Scientists may call this psychology, or whatever they please, but it has a power, come from whence it may, that can soothe the troubled breast, as a mother's pity and loving words used to heal our childish griefs and hush our sobbing cries into peaceful slumbers.

God intellect can only pray, like the drowning sailor, "O Lord, if there is any, save my soul, if I have any," and the aspirations of the soul must be by faith, until it is lost in sight of higher revelations of God and of the inner life.

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS OF KENTUCKY.

Letter from Geo. H. Krieder.

Friends:—I have anxiously looked for five years past, for some friend of progress to make an initiatory move towards organizing a State Spiritualist Society in this state, but have looked in vain. If the friends in Kentucky, will go to work, and all work together, we will in a short time, be able to have missionaries at work, under the auspices of a State Society, preaching the gospel of the "New Dispensation" to hungry souls.

Before we can organize, however, we must first prepare the ground, and sow the seeds of an organization. To begin this preparatory work, I request the friends to correspond with me, and answer the following question, viz:

1st. How many known Spiritualists are there in your village, town, city, or neighborhood?

2nd. How much money can you collect towards creating a missionary fund?

3rd. Can you secure for use on Sundays and week nights, a hall, church, court house, or any place of meeting, and what will be the probable expense of same?

When lecturers are lecturing here (in Louisville), they would like to visit places where the friends may desire them to lecture during week nights, and return to Louisville in time to meet their appointments. Suppose the friends throughout the state do respond to my request, I would then be in a position to give reliable information to lecturers. I do not propose to charge them for this intelligence, but will give it freely to all. We can put the "car of progress" in motion in Kentucky, and keep it going, if the friends will respond to my request. Are you willing friends to impede the march of liberal religious thought, by not taking the trouble to write a few lines? I hope not. Friends let me hear from you. Let us be up and doing. Let our motto be, ACTION!

Address communications in response to my request, to me at Louisville, Ky.; if a reply is desired, please enclose stamp.

John [illegible]

BROTHER JONES: There is somewhere in your State, a poor man, named John Hoteer, a native of Kentucky. He is co-heir to a large estate, of which he is ignorant.

Will you, through your valuable JOURNAL, as also other papers in your State, help to bring this to his notice? You will be doing an act of humanity to him and his family, if you direct him to the undersigned.

REAL LIFE IN SPIRIT-LAND.

By Mrs. Maria M. King.

Being Life Experiences, Scenes, Incidents and Conditions illustrative of Spirit Life, and the Principles of the Spiritual Philosophy. Given Inspirationally, by Mrs. Maria M. King, Authoress of "The Principles of Nature," etc. Boston, Wm. White & Co., 158 Washington street.

The spirit-land is apportioned to the various nationalities according as they require space to accommodate the twelve circles into which society is divided. Communities of the first circle are in juxtaposition with communities of the second; and these with communities of the third; and so on; the arrangement being that of a circular space whose interior is occupied by the twelfth or highest circle; around which the communities of the other classes are located in their proper order outward. By this arrangement, the communities of the first circle of different and adjoining nationalities, so-called, or the physical plane. The magnetism composing the spirit-forms of this class, is more nearly allied to physical magnetism than that of any other class of spirits; and to their localities are attracted the lowest grades of magnetism that gravitate to the spiritual sphere.

Were there no philanthropists of the higher circles who make it their business to aid nature in the localities belonging to the first circle, there would be less beauty there than appears else in the inhabited portion of the sphere; there would be less of that orderly arrangement of objects which make up a landscape; as groves, brooks, rich lawns, flower gardens, hill and dale, etc., as nature is aided by man in producing these forms of variety in the second sphere, as it is on earth. The weak-minded, uncultivated, indolent individuals who compose this circle, generally have no tastes for useful employments; those that have, need much instruction before they are capable of beautifying their own homes so as to render them attractive to themselves and to those who are coming there from earth from time to time.

There can not be supposed to be less order in the sphere above the physical, than there is in the physical sphere, or less adaptation of means to ends; therefore, it is inconsistent to believe that spirits upon a low plane in spirit-life are devoid of the comforts of life which only make life endurable with them.

Could it be supposed that less provision is made in the spiritual state than in the physical, no matter how low the grade, then there is an end of harmony in the universe; then the attribute of justice ascribed to the Supreme Being—then, indeed, there is no Supreme Intelligence in nature. Deprive the infinite spirit of nature of the two attributes, harmony and justice, and nature is deprived of a head. All things are thrown into chaotic confusion; man deprived of the right to faith that in the next sphere his condition is to be bettered; and how much more, then, would he long for annihilation than for immortality?

The Spiritual Philosophy points to death as a benefactor. It assures all men, the lowest as well as the highest, that the opportunities for advancement upon the moral and intellectual plane in the spiritual state are superior to the physical; for the reason, that the facilities for obtaining knowledge and practicing virtue are greater in the second sphere than in the first. It teaches the gradation of spheres; which signifies that matter is progressive, and rouses through stages, each successive stage being higher than the preceding. The gradation of spheres, moreover, signifies that all conditions of a higher, are superior to corresponding conditions of a lower, and vice versa. There being certain principles of the Spiritual Philosophy, termed also, very appropriately, the Harmonial Philosophy, the conclusion is irresistible, that the condition of all grades of humanity is bettered as human beings are transferred from the first to the second sphere.

It surely would not be an improvement upon the condition of individuals of the lowest grade, as savages, idiots and criminals, to place them beyond the reach of benevolent institutions, and where things were at "high hazard," even more than in the first sphere. It is surely placing man beyond the reach of benevolent institutions, not to say of individual benevolence, to locate them in a sphere where all roam at will and do their pleasure, with none to say "hold thy hand," and enforce the demand when one lifts up his hand against his brother, and where there are not facilities which place it in the power of individuals disposed to improve to gain appropriate instruction, and where those not disposed to improve are surrounded with such influences as perpetually enchain them to vice and ignorance.

It is a principle of the Spiritual Philosophy, that grades of matter act upon each other for mutual development, and correspondingly, that grades of spirits act upon each other for mutual development; the higher reaching down after the lower to bring it up, and the lower stimulating the progress of the higher by arousing its benevolent action in its behalf. Therefore the truth can not be controverted, that it is the especial business of high grades of spirits to look particularly after the interests of all the grades below; not only in the second sphere, but in the first.

Grade acts upon its affiliated grade; or, in other words, each circle acts upon the one nearest affiliated to it; and thus the plans instituted in the highest circles are propagated to the lowest, and put into operation by the power which spirits possess over lower grades of the disembodied.

The spirit-land is a heaven of beauty. Its lovely landscapes, its perfumed atmosphere, its balmy breezes and its sunny skies, are for all to enjoy. God sendeth the rain, His dew and sunshine, upon the just and the unjust, and thus he commands the love and gratitude of all whose minds are not so beclouded that these emotions can not be elicited from them. Yet His judgements follow men into that sphere of beauty, and His justice will not let them go until they are redeemed from the corruptions of the flesh—until His image is seen through them and they are fitted to be teachers and leaders to their children behind them. Let none imagine that they are to rest in the spiritual state with their imperfections upon them, and let all remember, that inasmuch as man is created in the image of God, there will be no actual rest for him until that image is fully wrought out.

The above extracts from Mrs. King's work on the spirit-land, show plainly why it has had such an immense sale in this country and Europe. To those of our readers who have not read the work, we would say, do so at once. It clearly presents the views of one of our best writers on the interesting subject.

"Hit"—By Dr. Mary E. Walker—American News Company, New York.

The above entitled work by Dr. Walker, who has become so well known from her career as the only female surgeon in our late civil war, and who always dresses in the American costume, will be sought for by a large class of the reading public. They will have a curiosity, if nothing more, to know what this eccentric female-perpronage has to say, well knowing, from her personal independence, that she will not restrain to speak her mind freely and fully upon whatever subject should happen to come under her consideration. A good book is the life work of a master-mind, and Dr. Walker has given in her work the result of an experience and observation which will not fail to work a salutary influence for good in treating upon the most important and vital questions which concern the happiness and well-being of humanity.

The preface contains a very elaborate and complete delineation of the author's mind and character, by S. R. Wells, of the Phrenological Journal. He thinks the author should be known for her great activity, energy and executiveness, also for faith, hope and trust in Providence; for her firmness, decision and self reliance, and next, for her powers of observation and reflection.

The work comprises about two hundred pages, unique in style, divided into eight chapters, with as many different subjects.

The first topic of discussion is that all-important one, "Love and Marriage," and the writer gives you an assurance from the start that she knows what she is talking about, notwithstanding the fact that she has not, as far as we know, experienced the heaven or hell of married life, if she ever has. Like sweets of love, which are essential to true marriage.

But this is not an objection, nor should it prejudice the reader at all, for those who write from the stand point of their own actual experience, give you a very one-sided view of the actual state of the case, ignoring that general observation and extensive knowledge of people, collectively and individually, and coloring their every thought with their own self eccentricities.

Miss Walker has come to the same conclusion with many others, that marriage is not what it ought to be, nor what it must be, if men and women would fulfill that destiny which God designed; and she endeavors to point out some of the errors that lead to so much unhappiness in the domestic relations.

Our states have laws compelling married people to live together when the wife perfectly loathes the very sight of her husband; one after another child is given an existence, that is hated by both before it is born. Each parent sees traits of character in their children that have been inherited from the other, thus arousing still greater repugnance to their children.

The writer thinks that women should make the first advances in selecting their life companions, whenever their intuition should thus prompt them, and adds that we are far behind the people of Persia, who allowed women to select husbands for themselves, if they owned a hut or a fishing boat.

True marriage will not be general until wives and mothers and sisters are equal with their husbands and brothers in all the social and political relations of life.

It was the perversion of the institution of marriage, and not the institution itself, that was condemned.

The writer closes this branch of her subject with quite a lengthy but interesting history of the laws governing marriage in the United States and in portions of Europe, Asia and Africa.

Dress Reform.

We especially commend this branch of the subject of dress reform to our American women.

Miss Walker, being a scientific physician, has treated this question in an admirable and scientific manner. She attributes much of the unhappiness in the married relations to the improper and injurious effects of long skirts, false hair, tight lacing etc., and recommends the American costume, as a sure remedy for the thousand and one ailings and disorders with which our more fashionable women of to-day are invariably afflicted. She says:

"So much of the nervous energy is expended on dress and dressing and carrying the burdensome stuff, that a morbid sensibility is induced, which women can not prevent. * * Not only does the husband suffer from this continuous irritability, but the children that are, and those that are to be, partake of the same. A vast amount of the illness of wives, physically, morally and mentally, is due to the slavish element of dressing. Even the want of the ballot is but a toy in comparison."

The wretched manner in which little children are dressed, is also sharply criticised, citing the fact that over 30,000 died in one year of 1860, before the age of five years; and that in the same year 77 30 deaths resulted from consumption and inflammation of the lungs. Our clergymen, of all creeds, are advised to come out boldly and talk in plain language against the foolish fashions of dress, as woman's "make-up" in these days is scarcely anything but one mass of ever-changing absurdities.

After proving that there should be an equal distribution of clothing in order to enjoy perfect health; that vitality should not be expended in dress, she closes this chapter with a description of the American reform dress.

The third and fourth chapters are devoted to the injurious and pernicious effects of tobacco and intoxicating drinks upon the human system, claiming that tobacco alone "has not only prevented some marriages, but in many cases destroyed the happiness of the married relations."

Physicians whose minds are so clouded with smoke that they will not only recommend the use of tobacco and justify its use, ought to be sent to the insane asylum to have the smoke extracted from their brains in order to make room for more knowledge of Materia Medica.

Tobacco generated thirst for strong drinks, and its injurious effects were visited upon posterity. Tobacco impaired both physical and intellectual development, produced paralysis and insanity, and parents should see to it that their children do not use it any more than the intoxicating cup. The amount expended yearly for tobacco in the city of New York, exceeds ten millions of dollars. If this amount were spent in relieving poverty and caring for degraded women, how many thousand agonies would be relieved, and millions more prevented.

The next two chapters are devoted to a consideration of woman's franchise and divorce. Political equality of the sexes will produce radical changes in society generally, and in the married relation especially, was very evident, but it was ignorance or selfishness that covers the whole ground of the opposition to woman's enfranchisement, whether it came from woman or man.

If it was right to be legally married, it was right to be legally divorced. The greatest of all crimes was the compelling of two beings to live together against their own will, as husband and wife. When people are truly united, no human power can separate them, but when they are not truly joined together, it is a crime not to divorce them.

The last two chapters are devoted to the subject's of labor and religion. No matter how much wealth there may be in the family, not only every son, but every daughter should possess a practical knowledge of some business or profession, whereby they may support themselves. There is more sickness and death by wearing out the system to gain pleasure, than in laboring honestly to secure it.

Religion, also, has something to do with the marriage relation and much of the inharmony in this relation results from a difference in the religious sentiments or the devotional points, as taught by the various religious sects.

But no religion can be true and genuine, unless it helps make homes happy, ennobles life, and embodies practically the grandeur of the golden rule.

Such a standard will contribute to make the marriage relations and homes generally, "the dearest places and conditions on earth."

MEDIUMS' DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory, giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. This will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the location of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time, that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

PARLOR ALBUM

AN FIVE QUARTO VOLUMES.

P. C. $200 per volume, or

$1000 PER SET COMPLETE.

Description of the Work:

THE PARLOR ALBUM is designed to be the most extensive ART GALLERY ever published, and, by those who have examined the several portions of the work, it has been pronounced, "The Ultimate of Beauty." Each volume contains 20 full-page Chrome Lithographs, in Oil Colors, 40 full page Steel Engravings, 40 full-page Engravings on Wood, and 500 pages of reading matter, descriptive of the illustrations, the whole making each volume about one-half an inch thick, and some-sized pages, as Webster's largest Dictionary. Each volume is complete in itself, and will be sold separately, if desired. Sold by Subscription Only.

Vol. I Dedicated to All American Birds.
Vol. II Contains Wild American Animals.
Vol. III, American Domesticated Birds and Animals.
Vol. IV, Foreign Birds and Animals.
Vol. V, Fishes, Reptiles, and Insects.

This work will at once commend itself to the cultivated American people, and no library will, hereafter, be complete without this addition to its treasures; while as a parlor amusement it is unequalled by American publications.

Agents Wanted.

We have agents very liberal terms for selling the above described publications, and wish to appoint an agent in every town in the United States and British Provinces. Experienced book agents, and all other persons of respectability should apply for agency at once. Any young man or young lady, by devoting a short time during the day or evening, secure a complete set, free of expense, or, if preferred, we will allow a large Commission in Cash.

We have prepared a most beautiful SPECIMEN BOOK FOR AGENTS, containing Five of the Oil Chromes, Ten Steel Engravings, Ten Wood Engravings, and 50 pages of descriptive reading, being about one-fifth the volume, together with blank pages, specimens of binding, etc., etc.

Our Specimen Book has cost us quite largely, and we do not wish to send it to persons who do not intend to act as agents, but to any one who will make an effort to procure subscribers for the Work, we will send the Specimen Book, prepaid, on receipt of 40 cents to cover postage. Office 187 and 189 South Clark Street.

RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE.

☞ All letters and communications should be addressed S. S. Jones, 189 South Clark Street, Chicago, Illinois.

CHICAGO, APRIL 8, 1871.

TERMS OF THE
Religio-Philosophical Journal.

$3,00 per year, $1,50—6 months, $1,—4mo.

☞ Fifty Cents for Three Months on trial TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or Post-Office Money Order, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to fifteen cents, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $2.50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

We number AHEAD on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the coming year, with or without further reminder from this office

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to Dec. 10th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith J.—10 Dec.—0." This if he has paid to Dec. 10th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—10 Dec.—9, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as 70 for 1870, or 69 for 1869.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL, should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

Spirit—Ah, your knowledge, how limited! The child will play with his toys, and while in the enjoyment of them, those who are older would regard the same as a necessity. Toys are useful to the young, and given an imaginary life, they answer a specific purpose. To the children of earth, or, I will say, a certain portion thereof, a God is a necessity, though only existing in the imagination.

Lucretus—But if God has no existence, certainly to worship an imaginary being, is only a farce.

Spirit—But to various ones on the earth-sphere, God is a reality,—that is, so considered, and when they endow him with all those noble traits of character that distinguish the pure in heart, good results may flow therefrom. This is really well. Educate certain persons in the belief that good acts are rewarded by a Sovereign of the Universe, and their whole course of life will be distinguished by deeds of charity, and great good will be accomplished by them. He who believes that every good deed re-acts a reward, needs no imaginary God.

Lucretus—But tell me, has not great good been accomplished by those who worship a God?

Spirit—Certainly. It is well, perhaps, that a certain portion of the world believe in the existence of a God. The child loves its toys—to it they often assume a living reality, but as its mind expands, they gradually cease to answer a specific purpose. The man who firmly believes in a God that rewards merit, but punishes sin, stands precisely in the same relation to humanity, that he does who believes that merit brings its own reward, and sin its own punishment.

Lucretus—Could not God exist as a principle—pervading all nature, and unfolding himself in various ways?

Spirit—No! I say emphatically, no! Intelligence that can not make itself visible to the senses, can not exist. Diffusive intelligence is an impossibility! Matter is eternal, and outside of that nothing can exist. Now, I know that so far as my knowledge extends, I never have seen one thing that God has accomplished. The works that I perfectly understand, I can execute. With those things that I perfectly comprehend, I know that God had nothing to do. I can so arrange the forces of the material world, that a rose or a tree will unfold therefrom. I once thought none but a God could do that. I now know that individualized intelligences perform that very work.

Lucretus—What! man make a rose, a tree, a flower? Impossible!

Spirit—Remain tranquil. In the spheres, are circles of spirits engaged in experiments in agriculture, and there is not a plant or shrub in existence, that they can not cause to grow independent of any God. How true it is, that often on earth, some wonderful seed is discovered, that gives a new turn to agriculture. That seed could point to that spirit circle as the author of its existence. I only speak of what I know.

Lucretus—The more I talk with you, the more convincing is your argument, that there is no Infinite God. But is not God (unconsciously to us) manifested in man?

Spirit—Oh, how reluctant you are to relinquish the idea of an Infinite God. You have the sentiment so deeply rooted in your nature, of a Supreme Being, that all I can say, will avail but little in convincing you to the contrary. God manifested in man! Well, supposing he is? Tell me, pray, where the God of our nature begins, and where it terminates! Are we partially man, and partially God? If so, will not some of the learned scientists of earth, tell me where the one commences and the other ends. If the influence of God is necessary in the unfoldment of man, there must be some time when it commences, and when it ceases. Your idea is really weak. Such a process would be an impossibility.

Lucretus—Your ideas in reference to God are really peculiar.

Spirit—I am bold in my assertions. For many centuries I have lived in the Spirit World. Many of the works of nature, as presented on earth, sink into insignificance by the side of the achievements of man in the higher spheres. I can control the forces that make the rose, but there are many things beyond my knowledge, but I am too wise to declare that God executed that which my mind fully comprehends.

Lucretus—Is nothing done outside of man? Is no work in nature independent of him? What about matter and its laws?

Spirit—I anticipated your question. Now let me tell you, that in the material world, are certain activities manifested when it is under the control of man. You take water, and it alone can not move the engine, but within it are certain activities which the ingenuity of man liberates, and lo! the pond ceases wheels move, and the train starts off. The galvanic battery can do nothing alone. Unaided it can not send forth the electric flash, or transmit a message; but add water and certain chemicals thereto, and a peculiar force or activity is liberated therefrom, and a current is formed that can prostrate the strongest man. Powder is powerless to project the ball from the cannon unless the activities therein are liberated by the aid of fire. Much of the fields of space is a barren desert, until its active principles are set in motion by the intelligence of man.

Lucretus—What! are not nature's laws constantly at work? You are upsetting all my pet theories; and I am ignorant indeed. Matter and its laws are eternal.

Spirit—You are in the primary class now. Everything is new to you here. I tell you that there are vast fields in space, that are, in one sense, a barren desert. The activities thereof can be set in operation by man. It is a peculiarity of matter, for steam to move the ponderous wheel,—yet steam is not constantly generated. The activities of matter are, in the barren fields of space, wholly in a negative condition. Those activities are liberated by individualized intelligences, the same as the activities of water can be liberated by heat, and are called steam.

Lucretus—What! a portion of the fields of space a barren desert?

Spirit—Yes. There are boundless fields where the activities of matter are wholly in a negative condition, and where no spirit can travel without first inducing certain conditions there. Spirits travel in a peculiar way. They are subject to law, the same as earth's children. You might as well try to traverse the vast Desert of Sahara without a camel, as to attempt to explore certain regions where the activities of matter are in a negative condition.

Lucretus—Are worlds formed from matter thus situated?

Spirit—Yes. Matter in many portions of space, is no more adapted to make a planet, than the Desert of Sahara is to raising corn or wheat. It must pass through many changes before it is adapted to the wants of intelligent beings. All its activities can not be brought forth at once. The various changes through which it passes are wonderful to behold.

Lucretus—Then, matter, in the regions of space, seems to be perfectly passive, waiting to have its forces set in operation?

Spirit—Yes. To render my position clear, I refer you to a quantity of ice. In that condition, its activities or inherent powers are in a dormant or negative state. Heat will melt it, and soon there are certain forces therein that become steam, (and they move the engine's wheel. Now, the fields of space contain all the activities of matter, and they can be liberated, or set in action, just the same as the activities or forces of the ice.

Lucretus—But tell me, please, how individualized intelligences can collect this material, if no God?

Spirit—Puny child! Your mind trembles as you glance around you, and observe the grandeur of the Spirit World. These ideas almost appall you. You are slow to relinquish the idea of the existence of a God, and although I know the truthfulness of my statements, you can not fully comprehend me. You desire me to explain the method by which spirits are enabled to move the ponderous wheels of the universe. At some future time I will do so, but I wish at present to be general in my remarks. The blossom on the peach tree, contains within itself the miniature forces that can form a world. It aggregates from the tree an object that is round. Certain activities under the supervision of intelligent beings, can eliminate from the negative matter of space—a world.

Lucretus—You appear to entertain the idea that almost everything is within the range of the power of individualized intelligences.

Spirit—Of course I do. By assuming such a position, I may shock your sensibilities, for I banish the idea of an Infinite God. The children of earth, who have been accustomed to kneel in reverential prayer, and look toward a God for assistance in the hour of need, will feel that the position I assume is detrimental to their highest aspirations! Oh, I would wrong no one! My life has been devoted to humanity. To the child I would give its toys, and to those who find relief in the attitude and aspirations of prayer, let them indulge in it,—no harm can result therefrom, but, perhaps much good.

Lucretus—Do all spirits assume precisely the same position that you do in reference to God?

Spirit—All that are on the same plane in the Spirit World, entertain the same views. While we do not believe in the existence of an Infinite God, we ascribe to individualized intelligence what you do to him. By demonstrating that no Infinite God exists, we make the destiny of man transcendentally grand and beautiful! Why should the world be shocked by my position? Why say, sacrilegious? Why declare that my position is ruinous to many? Puny child of earth, think to some purpose! If no Infinite God, then man has no one to measure power or wisdom with but his fellow man, and he must depend upon himself under all circumstances. Who, as he glances at the moving, throbbing worlds of space, at the blue vault of heaven, at the wide spread universe, would not exult in the idea that individualized intelligences possessed wisdom requisite to put in motion a planet or a comet. Tell me, pray, who would not wish my position true? Do I injure man by unfolding this grand truth! Wherein, if I do? Show you his true status. I know there is no God manifested in man, for where does the God commence and where terminate, in him? How can God and man be united, and each act out their respective missions? To the venerable Christian who has been accustomed to bow reverentially before what he supposed to be God, I would utter no word of disrespect. I know that such a person would be pained at the position I have assumed, and would feel lost without uttering his morning and evening prayers. When I see a person with such a devout nature, bowing in worship, if their aspirations are pure, I admire them.

Lucretus—Would not the world be better off with the idea that a God really exists?

Spirit—No! When man understands his true destiny, and learns the fact that his mission is not to sing psalms and thrum golden harps in praise of a God, he will then aspire to attain a high position in the Spirit World. Which would you prefer, the grand destiny that I have pictured out for you, or a God to do the same work?

Lucretus—I should greatly prefer the former.

Spirit—The world is gradually advancing from the position in which it has been for ages, and is prepared for the reception of the truths I have presented. In the rude idea of God as manifested among savages, we find Schiller's statement true, that "Man depicts himself in his Gods!" He adds to his own powers and they become infinite, and straightway he has a God to worship. The Indian would have an Indian God; the Negro one of like color. Man's idea of God, if he thinks one exists, must resemble him. The white man would not admit a Negro as a God, nor a Negro a white man.

Lucretus—But in that vast field of space, I see no water. Please tell me how water is formed, if no God to produce it?

Spirit—Within that negative matter are all the activities of the material world from which you just came. Ice could not produce water, were it not for certain active principles inherent in matter. I do not comprehend the action of the material world in all its details. I have found that my idea of God doing any work, vanishes just the moment I thoroughly understand its nature. I then find that individualized intelligences are connected therewith, and that through their instrumentality the work is accomplished. Let me tell you, there are vast fields before you. The higher you ascend the azure dome, and travel among the celestial orbs, the key-notes thereof only echo faintly the grandeur that lies beyond, and when one principle in the arcana of nature is understood, it only illuminates the mind that it may be able to advance still higher in the scale of existence. Below me, above me, all around me, I hear the footsteps of the advancing hosts, and God vanishes in all works the moment their nature is understood. When mystery vanishes, God vanishes. O children of earth, as I gaze upon you, bowing to an image of the imagination, I know that it will finally vanish, and that you will regard that worship as essential to your nature, as the toys of the child are to it. You, who have just come from the earth sphere, will learn that the "works of nature," as manifested on earth, sink into insignificance when compared with the achievements of spirits in the higher spheres.

☞ Those who look for faults find faults, and become fault-finders by profession; but those who look for truth find good, find that.

Modern Spiritualism.

Spiritualism to-day means something. A few years since, among a great many people, it was a term synonymous with fanaticism, being so branded by the orthodoxy, who saw in the beautiful truths which it was unfolding, the death-blow to the system by which they had so long held the masses of mankind in subjection, and they saw also the sentence which would remove from themselves the life of luxurious idleness which they had so long been leading. It is a well-known fact to-day, that every new truth is met at the threshold of its birth with the cry of Humbug!—stamped as such by men of professed learning, simply because it does not agree with their preconceived notions in regard to certain things. These gentlemen, in their egotistical importance, have arrived at the grand ultimate of truth! Nothing, in their opinion, can be of any worth, which they do not possess. Every invention and discovery of the past two thousand years has been met in this way, but it has been a marked feature of this opposition, that it has been fought only by those upon whose preconceived notions it was an innovation. This very opposition has been the element to fan into life every new principle.

As each new idea begins to unfold from the embryotic state, and its beautiful light dawns on the hitherto dark places, an agitation springs up among the people; they are soon divided into two distinct classes; the one side recognizes this light as a truth,—the other, not being far enough advanced in mentality to comprehend it, or fearing they may lose some of their rights (?), marshal their forces to crush the invader; but opposition only makes it the stronger, for the "Truth is mighty, and will prevail." This has been the experience of modern Spiritualism, but twenty-three years has drawn to its ranks twelve millions of the most intelligent men and women of America; and we doubt not before half that number of years shall have passed over us again, that these numbers will be trebled. The accounts we are receiving of the hosts who are daily becoming convinced of this new truth, will certainly bear us out in our statement.

Get up all the agitation you can, friends; make an effort, each and every one, to raise up some poor, bleeding heart from the dust, and aid them to leave the dark, beaten paths, which the tenets of an effete theology compel them to tread—to walk in the embrace of the new faith, where they can hold daily communion with the dear departed, without fear of ostracism from a church or a clique. You have the mighty angel hosts to stand by you in this noble work, and each and every good deed will meet with its just reward.

"That bourne from whence no traveler returns," has become worn out as a stereotyped phrase of olden time, for the traveler now returns daily, and manifests his presence to the loved ones through the medium of dark circles. The term Death has dropped the black pall with which it has so long been enshrouded, and is now looked upon as a mere transition from a low estate to a higher.

Modern Spiritualism is a true soul-religion—of and for the people. It requires no gilded domes or system of priesthood for its protection. It is free as nature's pure air, and broad as the universe.

Remonstrances.

We see by the proceedings of the Legislature of Michigan, that the Spiritualists of that State are wisely circulating the remonstrances against the Doctors' Bill, which we published in the JOURNAL, and which defeated a similar bill before the Legislature of the State of Illinois.

It is conceded by everybody in this State that it was the movement inaugurated by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL alone, which defeated that nefarious bill. But for the remonstrances which went up from all parts of the State, the law would have been passed to fine and imprison every medium who should attempt to heal the sick. As it was, when first put upon its final passage, it received the most signal defeat of any bill that has been before the Legislature the present session.

The Michigan bill is an exact copy of the one thus defeated in Illinois, and we hope it will share the same fate. But our friends may rest assured that the whole thing depends upon their being diligent in sending forward the remonstrances. Cut them out of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, and paste them on to paper, get them signed by your neighbors, and send them forward without delay, and the defeat of the bill is sure, otherwise it will be passed and become a law.

Harry Bastian.

Harry Bastian, one of the most wonderful mediums of the age, has returned to the city, and will hold seances regularly for the entertainment of friends and skeptics.

We with pleasure indorse this young man's mediumship, and recommend all lovers of truth and investigators of a new philosophy demonstrated by strange phenomena, to avail themselves of the opportunity now offered at his seances.

A new development in his mediumship has just transpired, in addition to what has heretofore been announced through the columns of this journal.

It will be remembered that spirits materialize their own organs of speech, and talk in audible voices with all persons who visit the seances; that they play musical instruments, that they place the solid iron rings on to the medium's arms when tied; that they take him and chair up from the floor and place him upon the tables when tied so fast that he can't move hand or foot, etc. But now they tie him so fast that the most expert sailors can't untie him, with the best use of their fingers; and yet, the spirits will do it in three minutes' time.

Again, we say to all investigators, fail not to make it convenient to attend Harry Bastian's seances. He will continue in Chicago for a few weeks. Information can always be obtained at this office on the day previous to the evening of the seance, where it will be held.

The Church a Human Institution.

In another column will be found an abstract of a sermon by Henry Ward Beecher.

Indeed, this is a radical age! The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL makes haste to gather up and dispense to its readers the early ripened fruit as developed from the teeming fields of thought, or other producing causes, whatever they may be, or wherever found.

The editors of this paper, ever on the alert for all that is within reach, seize the good wherever found, and feel grateful for the blessing of freedom of thought and freedom of speech, vouchsafed to the American people.

Spiritualism, in the broad and comprehensive sense, appreciates all reform as based in its philosophy, and will receive a truth as soon from the lips of Henry Ward Beecher as from the inspired soul of an out spoken and world-wide known Spiritualist.

It is the truth that maketh free, and little does it matter through what channel it reaches our perception.

It is a remarkable feature of the Spiritual Philosophy, that it first pulverizes all creeds, and leaves in their place a spiritual structure comprehending in its architectural bearings all that is good,—and all being good, in their place, every thing finds a proper use.

Thus it will be seen that Spirituality is not only an iconoclast, but a supreme architect in its nature, breaking to pieces idols—shams, and building up from realities a mighty fabric that will stand the touchstone of truth throughout all time.

Gratitude.

Our thanks are yet due to many who have secured new subscriptions for the JOURNAL, and to many more who are canvassing and proposing to do so.

Roll up the subscriptions, brethren. The opposition is making desperate efforts against Spiritualism. It is all important that the JOURNAL,—the boldest, the most independent—aye, the best paper in the world—should go into the hands of every doubter in the land. Where a person begins to doubt the doctrine of a Devil,—the Dogmas of the churches' hell-torments and a vicarious atonement—the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL will build him up in a sound philosophy that will stand the test in the most trying hours, and bring him en rapport with loved ones who have already passed to the Summer Land, to which all are rapidly tending.

Come, brethren, each and every one, help to circulate the JOURNAL.

Mrs. E. A. Blair, Artist.

Mrs. Blair, that most wonderful spirit artist, for painting flowers, wreaths, etc., while blindfolded before a public audience, has started for Chicago. She visits many places in her journey from Massachusetts to Illinois, at which she has received calls to practice her mediumship before public audiences, as well as in private. She will answer further calls from societies or friends. She can be addressed in care of this office, and letters will be forwarded to her from time to time to such places as she may be at. We have specimens of her work in our reception rooms, which are perfectly beautiful to look upon, especially when it is considered that the work is executed when she is blindfolded. All are welcome to call and see them. Chicago is indeed blessed with evidence most positive, that "though a man die, he shall live again; that no one, in fact, goes to "that bourn from whence no traveler returns."

The Northwest During the Revolution.

We are indebted to Hon. Lyman C. Draper, of Madison, Wisconsin, Corresponding Secretary of the State Historical Society of Wisconsin, for a copy of the Annual Address of the present year, delivered before said Society by Hon. Charles J. Walker of Detroit.

The Address is highly creditable to the author and Society. It is a most complete synopsis of the history of the events which transpired in the "Great Northwest," from the first establishment of trading-posts to the close of the revolution.

This address being so comprehensive, and so well adapted to the refreshing of the mind of the scholar, as well as to imparting useful knowledge to the youth and those in the humble walks of life, who are not familiar with the history of this portion of our country, we take pleasure in recommending it to the public as worthy of perusal.

The "Search after God."

"Be patient,"—that is all the answer we can give to the numerous letters we have received in reference to our "Search after God." The questions that have been asked in reference to the first earth, the first man, etc., etc., have been answered, and will appear in future numbers of the JOURNAL.—ASSOCIATE EDITOR.

A. J. Fishback.

Bro. Fishback writes us from Victoria, Mo., that he intends to start for Northern Texas in a short time. We assure our friends there that no better speaker or more worthy man has ever visited that locality.

We respectfully bespeak for Brother F. a favorable reception by the friends of Spiritualism wherever he may go.

E. V. Wilson.

Will lecture in Wheaton, Illinois, on Sunday, April 9th, at 10½ A. M., 2 P. M., and 7 in the evening.

Personal and Local.

—Letters to J. R. Francis should now be directed in care of this office.

—On our first page this week we present our readers with an account of the labors of Sister Wilcoxon in Louisville. She goes to Alton, Ind., in April, instead of Alton, Ill., as was stated in our last. The friends at Decatur, Ill., have secured her services for the month of May. She will also be present at the Convention in June. During her lectures in Louisville, great interest has been manifested in that city, and the number who attend lectures largely increased.

—Our friends in Davenport, Iowa, are favored with the presence of a good healer and developing medium, David P. Fuller. Accounts from residents say his healing powers are very fine.

—We are constantly receiving calls for mediums from different parts of the country. Nathan Stevens writes that a good clairvoyant and healer would be well received at Grand River, Iowa.

—Brother Charles M. De Leon is doing a noble work in Kentucky. He is a fine speaker and a good medium. He sends us a list of eleven new subscribers. Let others follow him in the good work. Address him at Moscow, Hickman County. In connection with this, we would call the attention of our readers to the call addressed to the Spiritualists of Kentucky, on the second page of this issue.

—Brother T. S. Givan is about publishing a paper at Louisville, Ky., and thinks of establishing a general headquarters for spiritual and liberal works. We believe that the undertaking will be a success. We know of no better opening than Louisville now offers for this purpose.

—The "Arcana of Spiritualism," by Hudson Tuttle, can not fail to be of interest to every Spiritualist in the country. It gives full, definite and lucid explanations as to what Spiritualism is, and what it embraces.

—Again we would call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of A. J. Graham, in another column. Short hand writing opens a new field of work for the young of either sex. This knowledge once gained by any one is an independent fortune.

—We would call the attention of our readers to the call for a grand mass meeting at Decatur, Ill., to be held in June. A great number of the best speakers are expected to be present, and we have no doubt the result will be highly satisfactory to all.

—Wm. Carr writes that a good clairvoyant or a trance speaker would be well received by the citizens of Warren, Clinton Co., Ind.

—We are in receipt of five new subscribers from T. C. Whitley, of Bonaparte, Iowa. Thanks, brother. May others deem this worthy of emulation.

—Encouraging accounts are constantly reaching us of the success of Bell A. Chamberlain, who is at present working in Iowa. She recently went to Forest City and delivered a course of six lectures there, the first they have ever been favored with. Great interest was awakened among the people. An unsuccessful attempt was made by the Churchites to break up the meetings. She sends us seven new subscribers from there. The leaven is working. She goes from there to Clear Lake, Mason City and Waverly.

—We clip the following from the Banner of Light. It will apply very well to our case, only, instead of one hundred on "God," we have three hundred, more or less:

"Correspondents must bear with us in consequence of the delay of their communications. We do the best we can, under the circumstances. We have only one hundred on hand on "God;" do., seventy five on "Organization," pro. and con.; fifty on "Re incarnation"; twenty five on "Settling Spirits," etc., etc., etc. What shall we do, friends? Print all your favors, to the exclusion of our usual variety? God bless you all! We thank you for your contributions, for they display talent!"

—Louisville, Ky., is an energetic growing city, with a large liberal element pervading its intelligent inhabitants. E. R. Spurrier & Co., proprietors of the Spurrier House, are highly popular with many of our friends who visit that city.

—Daniel W. Hull, we learn, cured a rose cancer in Providence, lately, which had troubled the patient for over two years, and had been pronounced incurable by all her attending physicians. He is doing a good work in Providence. At the request of many friends he has concluded to remain three weeks longer—till April 17th. Address care F. Hacker, Providence, R. I.

—The twenty-third anniversary of the advent of modern Spiritualism will be duly celebrated in Apollo Hall, New York, on Friday, March 31st. Poems and addresses will be delivered by some of the best Eastern speakers. A grand reception will take place, and dancing will be in order.

—We are in receipt of a letter from Salt Lake City asking for a good test medium and lecturer. There is plenty of work to do, and the field is daily growing larger.

—A negro in a Virginia jail on a charge of murder, has confessed his guilt, saying that a spirit had warned him on the night previous to reveal his crime, under pain of perpetual unrest.

—England is slowly but steadily increasing in liberal views. A bill is now before the House of Commons for a third reading, which allows the interment of a corpse in any parish churchyard, with any form of religious service desired by the friends thereof.

—Z. D. Hinkley, writing from Hastings, Michigan, says: "If any Spiritualist, medium or other human being calls on me, such as I have, give I unto them, and entertain them indefinitely. Tell them to swinck off at Jaxkson. It will cost but a hundred and eighty cents to reach Hastings, or one dollar from Grand Rapids. I live out of town; but call on Brothers Hadley or Reid, and they will trot you out, or instruct you otherwise. If the police get after the mediums, this will be a good place to hide, for in my immediate vicinity orthodoxy is shorn of its strength."

Let no one suppose that we esteem it a pleasure to send the paper to any subscriber on credit, after the time has expired for which payment has been made in advance, unless the subscriber deems it a favor to him or her. We are always well pleased to discontinue the Journal, on receipt of arrearages, when it is no longer wanted. So long as it is taken, we expect it will be paid for.

—Those being developed for mediums will do well to send for the two standard works on Mediumship, "Underhill on Mesmerism," and "Artificial Somnambulism;" by Wm. B. Fahnestock. They will be sent, post paid, to any address for $3.10.

J. J. Outly, an old artist of much experience, would like to correspond with any medium for spirit photographs, in view of opening a gallery in Chicago.

Narrative of a Dark Spirit—From the Infernal Regions.

NUMBER TWO.

I was born in one of the provinces of Italy, about three hundred years ago. My mother was a young gipsey girl, and my father was an old Jesuit priest, neither of whom had any parental feelings for me, and I have never seen either of them. My father, I am told, never saw me, and my mother placed me in a foundling hospital, when I was a few days old.

My first consciousness on earth, was in this hospital, under the care of Sisters of Mercy, who were doing all they could to fill the dreadful void left by the criminal negligence of those who had brought me into earthly existence.

I will not dwell upon these painful themes, and should not have mentioned them, but justice requires that the world should know something of the causes that have been influencing me in my fearful career of crime and suffering. All the base and low hypocritical cunning and concealment of my parents, had been transmitted to me in an intensified degree.

Villainy of the deepest die, fostered in the cloister, and carried out with a hellish purpose through life, by my father, stamped its impress in blackest characters upon the tablet of my soul. My earliest recollection, is of the sorrow which filled the minds of those good women who had charge of me, when they saw this fearful tendency to crime, cropping out very prominently in my nature, when I was but a very little child. I have always been cursed with a most vivid and retentive memory, and I now recall distinctly a council that was held over me by these good women, after days of fasting and prayer, on their part, that they might be guided by best wisdom, to know what they could do to save me from the yawning gulf of crime that was impending before me, and also how they might protect the other little ones of the household from the contaminating influences of my depraved life. Even at this time, I can recall with pleasure the influences of that council in my babyhood days, for strong as were the tendencies to crime, there were pure and holy desires, awakened by the loving tenderness and care of these good women, the which under some circumstances, might have been fanned into a flame, that would have led me through very different experiences. I was very strong and full of life. The criminal tendencies of my earlylife grew stronger, as also did the power of concealment, and I became an arrant hypocrite, professing religion whilst the most gross, corrupt and licentious feelings were constantly rankling in me.

So complete was this deception, that the good sisters, recommended me to enter the service of the Church, and at the age of twenty-one, I took the so-called holy orders, although my hands had already been steeped in crimes of the blackest die. One of the strongest passions of my corrupted life, was an intolerable desire to commit rape upon very young girls. I had outraged more than fifty of these, yet such was the completeness of my deception, that I escaped detection, until my twenty-third year, when, under the influence of this demoniacal passion, I caused the death of a beautiful young child, only nine years old. Her father traced the crime to me, and slew me, and thus ended my earthly career, at least in the body. Would to God that the veil of oblivion could be thrown over it forever, but ages of intolerable agony, have not blotted out the dark and fearful pictures, which even now rise up, phantom like, before me, and drive me almost to despair.

EXPERIENCES IN THE INNER LIFE.

The hell into which I was thus suddenly and unexpectedly, plunged was very different from that which I supposed would be the lot of such a person, according to the teachings of the church. I cannot say that it was better, for I cannot conceive of anything worse than I realized. The memorable words of Jesus, when he spoke of "the land of outer darkness, in which there is weeping and wailing, and gnashing of teeth," are literally true of this state. I was alone in the blackness of darkness, that seemed intolerable, and the only relief to me was when glimmering flashes of light revealed to me, some of the frightful pictures of my own dark and blood-stained career of crime. Oh! how I writhed in agony, and prayed that I might go back to earth and atone for the evils of my life, little knowing that if I went back there, I should pursue the same course, but it was of no avail; tortured with anguish and remorse, I found there was no escape. In this dark and fearful abode, I agonized for what seemed to me to be ages without any respite.

In the loneliness of this gloom and sorrow, I called aloud for companionship,—anything rather than this dark and desolate loneliness which grew still more intolerable.

Time rolled on and they came, not as I am now told in answer to my prayer, but in accordance with law, and the first living beings that I saw, were the poor victims of my own criminal lusts. I saw them but dimly at first, and I started back, for this was worse even than the grim and ghastly solitude that had been mine before, a deeper hell opened before me, and I perceived that this was the pathway that I was to travel. My next experience after this was the discovery of human beings, occupied as I had been in the pursuit of the lowest and most degrading crimes on earth. My association with these relieved me, more by occupying my time, than from any mutual pleasure, although I found some lustful gratification in my association with those who were committing the loathsome crimes that closed my earthly career. I am told that spirits on such planes, do influence mortals, although neither party may be conscious of it. I was not at all.

Soon after this I began to find companions here, who, like myself were confined to our dark and dreary abode. We had been moving about near each other for a long time, without any consciousness of this, for all these dark spirits are blind. There was no love or sympathy between us, we were ever ready to take advantage of each other, and considered it a smart trick to over-reach one another. It was among these, that I learned to use the black cloth cover or mantle, which you saw when we first met. Wearied with our crimes we sought the shelter of these gloomy, oven-like places, in which you saw me. I speak the honest conviction of my soul, when I declare that I am not guilty of any wrong intention towards that young woman for whom you are now laboring. All that I know of her case is, that when I approached her I felt somewhat relieved and a sort of satisfaction. I was never aware that my influence was in any way injurious to her. I am told that this is a common experience of spirits, who, like myself, dwell in darkness and the shadow of death. They are constantly doing that which causes others to suffer without being conscious of it.

I am told further that if there had been a knowledge of the cause of this trouble years ago, and the same means, applied that you are now using, the relief would have been much more easily and promptly attained.

I certainly have no unkind feelings towards that dear child, and shall rejoice with you in the removal of all her distressing feelings.

It remains only to me to say what have been my experiences in the wonderful transition, which has taken place, since you and your friends on earth and here, have broken the spell that bound me to those dark and dreary scenes. You know how reluctant I was to speak to you, and how full of suspicion I was towards every one. It required considerable time and effort, for me to acquire any confidence in those kind and good spirits, to whom you introduced me, and who, though unseen by me, took me firmly and gently by the hand, and led me away from the scenes in which I had so long lived and suffered.

The place to which they took me, was free from those boisterous feelings of continued unrest, which had marked all my former surroundings in this life. There was a gentle restraining influence upon me, like that of a good and true woman. It recalled the memory of that council which the good Sisters of Mercy, held in the days of my babyhood. I have not yet seen either of these spirits, but I recognize that they are male and female from their influences upon me.

The result thus far has been to get me into a quiet state, in which I have some thoughts about myself and my surroundings. I feel very desirous of being forgiven by all whom I have injured—in any way, and there springs up thoughts and feelings in my soul that I will forgive every one that has in any way injured me. I hope you will continue to give me your advice, for you are the only one that I can see, that I would be willing thus to confide in. I know not what to do. I should certainly be very glad to labor anywhere and at anything, and some how I feel that my first work now, must be to help those whom I have injured, but let the work be where it may or what it will, I pray for strength to do it. Will you continue to help me.

With the assurance that we would do all we could for him, and the advice that he should continue with the spirits, who stood by his side and aided him in giving his narrative to us, we bid him God-speed, and have no doubt that the time is not far distant when his eyes will be opened to see brighter visions, and that he may now find the means of outworking his salvation from the dark abodes in which he has so long dwelt. Thankful for the opportunity of blessing this brother, we send forth his narrative to the world, hoping that others may be, as we have been, instructed by it.

Missionaries.

At a meeting of the Board of the American Association of Spiritualists, held at Cleveland, Ohio, the Committee on Missionaries, were authorized to make arrangements for the employment of such. Several names were proposed and referred to the Committee.

They were also requested to organize if practicable any suitable persons could be engaged to organize lyceums.

J. S. Loveland, presented his resignation in writing, which was accepted and Susan C. Waters of Bridgewater, N. J., was elected to fill the vacancy.

At a meeting of the Board held in Philadelphia, the Committee on Missionaries reported that neither of the parties proposed at the last meeting had accepted the appointment, and that for want of funds, they were unable to employ missionaries.

Miss Abbie W. Baker had gone to Texas, and had been authorized to organize lyceums, and collect funds for this Association.

Susan C. Waters, and Dr. Child were appointed to prepare an address to be published in the Spiritual papers.

The Treasurer reported that he had received one hundred and eight dollars, and twenty three cents, and paid out on orders of the Board fifty-one dollars and thirty-three cents, leaving a balance in the treasury of sixty-six dollars and ninety cents.

The Secretary was directed to give notice through the Spiritual papers, that the Board were prepared to receive further application for a place for holding the next annual meeting of the association.

Marriage Notice.

Benjamin Fish, of Rochester, N. Y., and Louise M. Henck, of Philadelphia, appeared at the house of Dr. H. T. Child, in Philadelphia on the 23rd day of February, 1871, and in the presence of a number of their friends, the said Benjamin taking the said Louise by the hand, declared that he took her to be his wife in accordance with the certificate which they were about to sign, and the said Louise declared, in like manner, that she took the said Benjamin to be her husband.

The said parties then and there (the said Louise adopting, according to custom, the name of her husband) signed the following

CERTIFICATE

This is to certify that we, Benjamin Fish of Rochester, N. Y., and Louise M. Henck of Philadelphia, assume to each other the relation of husband and wife; but at the same time we solemnly protest against all Marriage Laws, whether legal or conventional, which subject either the wife, or the husband, to any control or influence on the part of the other, which is not in accordance with the dictates of pure and mutual Love.

Philadelphia, February 23rd, 1871.

Obituary.

Born into spirit-life, on the morning of March 21st, in the 50th year of her age, the wife of Hon. Isaac H. Soule, of Stillwater, Minnesota.

Gone to the Summer Land, one of earth's best,
To join her loved friends in the home of the blest.
A kind husband is left her absence to mourn,
And two faithful sons of a mother are shorn;
They know she's now landed on yonder bright shore,
Freed from earth's troubles—yet her loss they deplore.

Her record of earth-life is spotless and pure;
Her good deeds and kind words will long endure;
And her many friends here will the memory bear
Of her sweet influence, and kind, loving care;
Tho' the casket is laid, yet she will be near,
Her companions and friends on life's journey to cheer.

By a true, living faith she was ever sustained;
The Harmonial Philosophy by her was maintained;
She loved all his beauties, its truths she engraved
In practical work, by which all may be saved;
She taught by example, more potent by far
Than wordy orations of pulpit or bar.

Her home's with the angels all beaming with light,
Her soul's filled with rapture and rapturous delight;
For the eye hath not seen, nor the mind conceived
Of the glories and beauties there revealed,
To those who, like her, had the truth ever loved,
And laid up their treasures in mansions above.

Banner of Light please copy.

On Saturday, the 11th inst. of heart disease, Henry Snow closed his earthly labors, and passed on to the spiritual life. Aged 66 years.

Mr. Henry Snow has been a resident of Battle Creek, Mich., for fifteen years past, and was esteemed by all who knew him, as a man of strict [illegible] amiable disposition and moral worth. In [illegible] years of his life, he was a believer in the doctrine of [illegible]versalism, the final holiness and happiness [illegible] But in later life he became convinced of the presence of the departed, and believed in the ministrations of angels. Happy in the beautiful faith that his spirit friends were near him, and that when he, too, left the worn-out body he should linger near, watch over, protect and bless those left behind, he quietly passed away, rich in life's experiences, and ready to enter upon the upper life's active fields.

The funeral services were on Tuesday, at his late residence, where a large concourse of friends testified their respect for the deceased and his bereaved family.

Died, March 12th, 1871, Maggie A. Boyer, aged 29 years.

She died calmly—failing sweetly to sleep, without a struggle or a murmur, and retaining consciousness to the last. In answer to a question, she said, "I am not afraid to die. I will meet my mother and father, my sisters and brothers, who have all gone the same road before me." A few moments after expressing her views she died in her husband's arms, the victim of hereditary consumption.

Mrs. Mary T. Strang, a Spiritual lecturer, conducted the funeral services. She delivered a most affecting and impressive address, eulogizing the virtues of the deceased.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

SPEAKERS' AND MASS CONVENTION.

As Chairman of the Committee appointed by the Northwestern Speakers' Association, I am requested to call a Speakers' and Mass Convention, to be held at Smith's Opera House, Decatur, Illinois, on the 2d, 3d, and 4th days of June, 1871; to commence its first session on Friday, June 2d, at 10 o'clock A. M.; and to continue them for the three days as directed by the Convention.

This Association has commenced a series of meetings to gradually change the good social conventions that have found many good homes for worn, wearied, and sick mediums and speakers, to good social reasoning conventions, to establish the rules by which all faithful workers in the cause of truth will receive a just support. Such progress is necessary, in this transition period of religious associations, from the theological to the scientific, and from the rule of the Christian priests of earth, licensed by man, to that of the angels of heaven, through mediums licensed by the laws of God.

This Convention is called to continue the progressive work of the Association, to establish the order and love of the angels in heaven, among the people of the earth.

Invitation is extended to all to be present. Those who attend will receive a cordial reception by the Spiritualists and their friends in Decatur.

Persons wishing special information about this entertainment of speakers and others, will address the Secretary of the Committee of Reception, H. Right, Box 290 Decatur, Ill.

H. S. Brown, M. D., Chairman.

MEDIUMS.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium,

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

Mrs. Robinson, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and its nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

Mrs. Robinson also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well when the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms.—Diagnosis and first prescription, $2.00; each subsequent, $2.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $3; answering Business Letters, $3. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

DUMONT C. DAKE, M. D.

Electric bands and soles, for cold feet, faulty circulation, nervous diseases, price, $2.00. In ordering soles, state size of boot or shoe worn, also the width required, and whether for a lady or gentleman. Sent by mail or express. In sending for circular and terms, inclose stamp.

MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD,

Healing Medium,

Has been before the public as a successful Healer the past fifteen years. We rely entirely on the controling influences. We diagnose and give prescriptions by letter. Distance no objection. Will visit in person a reasonable distance those that desire, and can afford the expense. Delineation and advice in a variety of ways. Emblems we give gratuitously to all our patients, when presented by our guides. Our former custom has been to come en rapport with the applicant by the hand-writing or lock of hair; but to save time, and the unpleasant sensation of taking on the symptoms of the disease, we require the applicant to give age and sex, with one or two leading symptoms of the disease, written by the patient, if able to write—if not, send a lock of hair. As the giving of tests is not the object which we seek, but to restore the patient to health by Nature's own hand, in the shortest time possible, we do not deem it necessary here to lumber up an advertisement with what we have done or what we can do, but prefer to be known by our fruits.

Terms, for diagnosis and prescription, $2; Diagnosis without prescription, $1; all subsequent prescriptions, $1 each. All letters should be accompanied with the fee, and addressed to MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD, Box 45, Lake Mills, Jefferson Co., Wis.

THE CHURCH A HUMAN INVENTION.

Extraordinary Sermon by H. W. Beecher.

In commencing his sermon, yesterday morning, Mr. Beecher said that he proposed to comment on the history contained in the 21st chapter of Acts, from the 15 h to the 26 h verses, descriptive of Paul's being commanded by the elders to go up and sacrifice in the temple, that the Jews might be persuaded of his orthodoxy. The fact was, said Mr. Beecher, that Paul's orthodoxy was suspected, and when his name was mentioned people probably said, "Yes, he is a very zealous man, but I am afraid of what he says; it is hardly right to talk about these things, but I hope it will all turn out right." They would say, "Paul is popular; he has the art of stirring up the masses, and if I only thought he was sound at the bottom I could approve of his ministry." And so after twenty years of labor Paul came to Jerusalem to find that he was not orthodox, and the remedy prescribed was most extraordinary, considering that all these men were Christians. It was that he should go up with these four men, who were under a vow to pay their charges, and engage in all the ceremonies of the temple with them. That is, subscribe to the full Westminster Confession of Faith, swallow it whole in the presence of the people, and then they would see that he was orthodox. They say to him, "Go up into the temple, just as if you never heard of Christ; go up with these men, pay their charges, stand with them to be recognized with the priest," &c. And so Paul went up into the temple, and this was what the elders recommended him to do, as if there was no other religion than the religion of the temple. This scene is one of the most extraordinary in the New Testament. It strikes us as very strange that Paul himself should not have sufficiently indicated his adhesion to the notion of faith as not to have been suspected of heterodoxy. It does not follow that all men who are suspected are like Paul; it does not follow that a man may not be justly suspected; but it does show that when a man undertakes to develop a higher conception out of a lower one, he renders himself liable to misconception as having abandoned the faith. People like to hear what they have been used to hearing; the views a man has been educated in—the views which men have held as sectarian—become parts of their selfishness, and when men preach that view with force and power, it is a kind of settled compliment to them. Men like to see old things in new clothes. But when any one attempts to develop out of an imperfectly conceived truth or morality a higher spiritual element, just as he goes from leaf to blossom and from blossom to cluster, will be met with opposition, and will be doomed to disappointment. The Christians had accepted Christ, and yet they could not bear to break off from the temple or from the ceremonials of the Mosaic law. When they heard that Paul did not care for circumcision, they said to themselves, "This Paul is an invader of some things; he is a dangerous man; he may be right, but there is no knowing when this thing will end." The question is, that with regard to doctrines presented in a new form, do they tend to produce larger views of spirituality or its like? Are they lowering the moral standard or raising it? Everything whatever tends to carry men up toward faith and love, and disinterested activity, can not do wrong. This scene reveals the fact, that thirty years after Christ's death the Christians of Jerusalem were in full communion with the Jewish temple. The whole central mother Church were at that time in full communion with the temple. Where, then, is the claim that Jesus delivered to his Apostles or to any wise shaped out the Christian Church or the Christian polity? Here, thirty years after his own ascension, was the mother Church, but a few steps from the place where he offered himself for sacrifice; here was the mother Church still offering up sacrifices in the old Jewish temple; nay, so tenacious were they that they took the chief apostle of it and made him go through the whole ceremonial. And yet how many times have we heard it said that our Lord told the Apostles just how the Church should be established, just what its worship should be? Why, do you suppose if our Lord had said to his Apostles, "This is to be the Church," that they would have forgotten it? Would Paul not have said to them, "Is the temple the pattern of the Church?" You can not find in the history of Christ one single word showing that there was to be one kind of a Church rather than another, and the whole Church is a purely human invention; none the worse for that, but the whole authority is gone from which it is said to be derived. The Christian scheme was not philosophy, still less an organization. The Christian scheme was something far transcending philosophy, far nobler than organization; it was a power introduced into the world by which, with a vast impulse, men should be led up toward an ideal life, and its central peculiarity is its life transcending all human progress, and then carrying man up to that life. From the time of Christ down to our day it has been growing, and it has had to pass through all the experiences that any other philosophy has had to pass through. The only thing that was employed in our master's teaching was that there should be some external form but what it was to be was not declared. If it was, how did it happen that our mother Church did not know it and was still in the Temple, and made Paul go there and offer up sacrifices? Thirty years before, the great sacrifices had been offered up to establish a new Church, and yet they have not found it out, and were still attempting to carry out the spirit of Christ and the external ceremony of the Jews. Mr. Beecher then spoke of the different ceremonials prescribed for the Gentiles and the Jews, and said that this was proof that it never was intended that one form of worship should be obligatory on all, but that men should be left free to select worship to the circumstances in which they were placed. Paul knew that the ceremonies were nothing, yet he would not wound the prejudices of the people, and so he conformed to them, and nowhere can be found the principles of personal liberty more strongly insisted on than in the teachings of Paul. He declares that a man who is truly a man in Jesus Christ is a free man, for if he be learned in the spirit of Christ, that will stand him instead of rules or ordinances, and he will be a law unto himself. He resented all intrusion on personal liberty, both of himself and other men. He believed that all that was necessary was that man should love God in his heart, and when a man rose to that state in which he could see God, he might baptize or not baptize, partake of the Lord's Supper or not partake of it, make offerings to an idol or not, just as he chose, it would make no difference to him; and my impression is that if our Lord and Saviour were on earth now, there are very few Churches into which he could get. He would not be considered as sufficiently would say we will bap

it, but they will be as well

'Now modern people say,'

call sincerity, to baptize one another?' But Paul said, 'I law of ceremonies.' Is not

Christ given? I will use or not use; I am not bound to use the same ceremonies one day that I do another, any more than a surgeon is bound to the same knife to amputate a limb to-day that he used yesterday, or the physician to give the same medicines to all his patients. I tell you that all outside forms of religion, how you shall build your churches, or the whole economy of ordinances, are but instruments to an end, and you may use them if you can make any thing out of them. I should not hesitate at all if I went into a Roman Catholic church, where they all take holy water, and make the sign of the cross, I would take holy water and make the sign of the cross too. [Laughter.] Yes, but it will be said, won't you lend encouragement to their erroneous beliefs? Not any more than Paul did. Is there not something behind the superstition; can I not reach the man by treating these superstitions kindly instead of rudely? Love with faith sets me free from the bondage of ordinances or ceremonies, says to me "If you need them use them, but if you have no need do not use them." I do not keep Sunday because I think it a religious day as the law defines it. I keep Sunday because I love it, but I am not bound to do so. If a man say 'I feel at liberty to seek my Sunday in the forest,' I say you are at liberty to. If he say he wishes to worship God in the fields, I tell him to do so. I may question his sincerity, but if I find him sincere, I tell him that he has perfect liberty to go. Do you call these heresies? They are shocking heresies, and for all of them I plead the example of the Church at Jerusalem. I plead every thing that is 2 000 years old; and the age of every thing from wines up to creeds is generally the test of its superiority. Mr. Beecher then spoke of the objection to associating with these whose beliefs are different from your own, from fear that they should be said to countenance their errors; but Paul did this, and he did it on principle. He made himself all things to all men that he might win souls to Christ. Sir, for the sake of winning men to a higher life, a man conforms to the opinions of others and acts in such a way as not to jar their educated beliefs, if he does this for the sake of winning them to a higher belief, then it is right. It is a miserable orthodoxy that can not bear the contact with another belief. It sheds its sun over all alike, even on devils. When the terrible disaster at New Hamburg occurred, and men were rushing in crowds to the rescue, do you suppose it was necessary for them to stop and ask each other, "Are you a Democrat or a Republican?" or say, "I am not going to be seen working alongside of a Democrat?" For years and years, in the City of Brooklyn, the children of the Unitarian Sunday schools have not been permitted to walk with the other schools on the anniversary day. These little children were not permitted to walk the streets together for fear of contamination. There was one sad eye and one glad eye that looked at that scene. Christ was sad and the devil was glad. If we have the love of Christ above all other things, there is no one human being on earth that you can not own as a brother, or go down to him and work with him and for him. I could sit and worship in many and many a Unitarian Church or Swedenborgian Church, or Roman Catholic, or Baptist, or Methodist, or Episcopal. I could go their way if it was necessary, and I would not hesitate to be immersed, even as I immerse others, if I thought I could gain them on the other side of immersion. It is immersion to me, but they are weak and need it. But churches save the chaff and straw and let the wheat go where it may.

Report of the First Society of Waukesha.

BRO. JONES:—I wish through the JOURNAL, to report progress in this part of the spiritual vinyard.

In September last a few friends met and organized the First Progressive Society of Spiritualists of Waukesha, by the election of a President, Vice Pres., Secretary, and Treasurer, with power to act as Trustees of the Society.

To be brief, we will say that we soon had subscribed the sum of four hundred dollars, and invited our old Brother, E. W. Sephens, of Janesville, Wis., as our regular speaker, every alternate Sunday, for three months. At the expiration of that term, our Brother had grown so much in favor, with our people, that we resolved to engage him for another three months which has just closed, and after the close of his evening lecture, on the 19 h inst, before a full house, he united in the solemn bonds of matrimony, Mr. Bradley P. Balcom, of Genesee, (President of the Southern Wisconsin Association of Spiritualists), to Mrs. Lottie Hill of this place. The lady is a member of our choir, and a fine singer. Long may they live in the full enjoyment of their present union.

Our Bro. Stephens is a farmer by occupation, a hard working man, had never entered the field as a lecturer, until he was called to speak with us, although he had spoken occasionally to good acceptance. It has been our good fortunes to find that our brother possessed too noble a talent to remain longer at his agricultural pursuit.

We have therefore, secured his services, a portion of the time for the coming Summer.

Our congregations are stead ly increasing, and our souls are filled from the rich storehouse of his scientific brain, as he launches out into the unexplored regions of thought, thus bringing to us in glorious strains of eloquence and beauty, those mighty truths so long hidden from humanity's view.

Since he began his labors with us, he has lectured at various points along his line of travel, and has sown seed that will some day bring forth fruit. We sincerely hope that the Spiritualists of our State, will put forth a helping hand, and sustain him most bountifully as he so richly deserves to be.

He enters the field without soil or blemish, and will devote his time to the dissemination of our glorious cause; so soon as our friends have ascertained his true worth, and will seek their own best good, and pleasure.

When the Spiritualists of our country shall have learned the great and important lesson, as they seem now to have learned with us, that so by put of their surplus treasure for the spread of our glorious system of philosophy for the enlightenment of man-kind, would produce an hundred fold more real enjoyment than can possibly be realized by hoarding it up, like the poor, stingy, starved m sel, they will then have discovered that a step has been taken in wi dom's path, that will follow them down the ages, with constantly it creasing means of enjoyment.

What are the bubbles of earth compared with true spiritual knowledge? The former we must leave behind, while the latter will fill our souls with goodness, that will follow us through the coming centuries.

Waukesha, Wis., March, 1871.

W. B. HOLBROOK.

Letter from F. Culver.

BROTHER JONES:—Enclosed please find draft for ten dollars to pay up my arrearages, and the balance to apply on subscriptions to the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL. Should have sent it sooner, but have put it off from time to time, but we trust it will be satisfactory even at this late hour, as we read that those that came at the eleventh hour received every man also his penny."

Sandwich, Ill., March 16 h, 1871.

Thank you, brother. God speed all others in like situation, in securing the eleventh hour penny by like acts of justice. We are certainly bearing the "heat and burthen of the day," and need all that is our due.—ED. JOURNAL.

IOWA.

Report of the First Spiritual Society of Maquoketa.

The First Spiritual Society of Maquoketa, held their annual meeting for the election of officers on March 1st, and transacted other important business. The following persons were chosen: H. W. McCarron, President; Mrs. S. S. Chase, Vice President; G. A. Gray, Secretary; D. L. Haight, Treasurer; H. M Arnold and W. Gaudi, Trustees.

There are quite a number in this locality, whose names do not appear on our records, who manifest a deep interest in the progress of liberal ideas, and a free religion, based upon facts. It is proposed to take immediate steps to secure first-class speakers and mediums. We desire a visit from F. L. Thayer, or some other equally good physical test medium, also some speaker well versed in the philosophy of Spiritualism.

Assist us, Bro. Jones, all you can. We need some able exponent to break to us the bread of life, and make glad the heart of man. A growing library of Spiritualistic books, containing quite a number of volumes, circulate here quite extensively, aiding materially the good work of enlightening the mind, that naturally seeks to prove all things and hold fast that which is good.

Though bitterly and unjustly attacked by the Orthodox ministers of the place, the Spiritualists, as a class, have nothing to fear, being always able and willing to give a reason for the hope within, enabling them to return the good of truth for the evil of error. If the clergy were as anxious to discover truth as they are to perpetuate sectarianism, they would then have no object in maligning us. But as the people advance in intelligence, the influence and power, of the priest diminishes, as the light shine, and hasten the day of true mental freedom, when humanity shall acknowledge no authority but truth, as it is discovered and appreciated by each individual soul.

The glorious herald of emancipation, RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, is doing a noble work wherever it is read. Its thousands of subscribers may be justly proud of it. We hope soon to see its circulation more than doubled. We are making the effort in this place. If one or two energetic persons in each place would canvas among their friends for a few hours, the result would be attained, and lasting good accomplished. See to it, friends, that our Spiritual papers be sustained, and after you have read them, and appropriated the good that is contained in them, circulate them among your Orthodox neighbors. H. W. MCCARRON, Maquoketa, Iowa, March 9th, 1871.

Letter from Abbi Lord Palmer.

BROTHER JONES:—Welcome! did I say to the dear RELIGIO, as it came last night to my home, and I greet it as an old friend, and bearer of sweet messages from the co-laborers in the cause of truth, that bring peace and joy to my soul. Thrice welcome is it now, because I can say it is received by husband and myself at our home; yet in the past, it has cheered my lonely life, made my purpose stronger,—by its stirring and earnest words of kindness and counsel—to live the life of a medium, which has been no easy task, and at times, one of humiliation. True are the words of Della E. Dake. "Mediums need all your help and encouragement; all your sustaining words and actions, to incite them to their labors." And here may I add, that mediums ought to live above envy, strife and vain-glory, aiming to work more harmoniously and zealously in the cause of truth, letting their acts be such that the world may know they have communed with angels.

Visiting the Spiritualists of Dixon and Mendota, I find those in Dixon desiring a talented, trance speaker, but undecided whose services to procure. Mendota, is blessed with a wide-awake class of reformers. Circles are held every week, and well attended. Lou Hopper and Mrs. Lorgan have just fulfilled a satisfactory engagement with the society. I gave some very good tests of spirit power while in those towns. One skeptic remarked, "Abbs Lord, you can, I think, foretell the future. Two cases have come to my knowledge, where you told certain individuals that money was soon to be received; and what would be done with it. One prophecy came true in an hour, and the other in a few weeks and both statements were disbelieved at the time, so no one had an idea that they could be true."

A lady of Mendota, an inquirer into the Spiritual Faith, Mrs. Dr. Edwards, said that I gave a correct phrenological examination and personal description of her husband and children who were not present, and whom I never saw, only having an introduction to Mrs. Edwards some ten minutes previous.

Now, "Home again!" happy that my visit has been so pleasant; that loving friends have bidden me "God speed" and reluctant "adieus." To those loved ones my heart will ever respond with pleasant memories and a sister's love.

What more do we wait for? That we may come to the undimmed visions of eternal glory? That this body that inveats us like a drapery of mist may be dissolved?

I look for no millenium, but for a substantial advance in all the common principles of morality, when men and women realize that they have souls; for the choicest blessings and gems of thought from the angel sphere, adorning the JOURNAL'S pages, and it gladdening every heart, bathing for every truth, and never ceasing to "Search after God," until all shall know him, from the least unto the greatest. My eyes rejoice in its dawning, and my heart awakes to worship and to praise.

CONVINCING TEST.

Spirit Phenomena.

BRO JONES:—A gentleman by the name of Wm. Taylor, an acquaintance of mine here in this city, whose character for veracity, to my knowledge, never was questioned, and who is the father of a family, came into my office, and related the following incident, which you are at liberty to put in print if you choose.

FRANCIS BAKER, City Marshal.

Los Angeles, Cal., Jan. 27, 1871.

I was owner of a restaurant in San Francisco, and employed a night cook by the name of Edward Taylor. My restaurant was on Market Street, between Dupont and Kearney. His wife's maiden name was Victoria Diver, and she was in the habit of going to the restaurant at night to keep her husband company in the kitchen, and when there was nothing doing, he would place her upon a stand, for a seat, and lay his head in her lap, when she would sing him the song called "Daisy Deane." When it was about time for me to come to the restaurant in the morning to relieve him, she would ask what time it was, and if it was not about time for me to come, and upon receiving a reply in the affirmative, she would say, "It is time then that I should be going," and as she passed out of the saloon, would invariably view herself in the glass and then go home.

About the last of March, 1870, she was taken sick, and when she became convinced that she could not live, her husband and myself asked her to promise that if it were possible, she would come back after death, and manifest herself to both of us, which she promised to do.

About three weeks after her death, I was going into the restaurant in the morning as usual, when I met her coming across the saloon toward the door. She stopped and looked into the glass, and then came toward me and shook hands with me. I said, "Is this you?" She answered, "Yes; but I must be going now," and stepped out of the door and walked down the street out of sight. After I had recovered myself enough to do so, I went into the kitchen, and found my cook in such a state that he could hardly speak. I asked him what was the matter, when he said that he's wife had been there with him. He told me the particulars of the affair, which are as follows:

He was at work in the kitchen, when he heard three raps at the door, the same as his wife used to do. He opened the door, when she said as was her habit, "Why, Ned, you are a long time coming." He asked, "Are you coming in?" She answered, "Yes." She then followed him into the kitchen, and talked to him a short time, then said, "Now lift me upon the block and lay your head in my lap," which he did; and she sung to him the first two verses of her favorite song. After singing them, she asked, "When will Mr. Taylor be in?" He answered, "Pretty soon." She then said, "I must be going," and started out of the kitchen, when I met her as before stated. She looked as natural as life in every respect, but before I had time to collect my thoughts she was gone.

I was always a violent opposer of Spiritualism, but such a proof as I have had, seeing, hearing, and feeling, has been enough to convince me that there is something in it, although I have never yet been at a circle, or to my knowledge seen a medium, and know nothing of it, although I will take my solemn oath that every word I have written is true.

WM. TAYLOR.

H. MELVILLE FAY.

Letter from Geo. C. Armstrong.

S. S. JONES:—In Vol. XI, No. 24, of the JOURNAL, you advertise H. M. Fay as an impostor. He gave several seances in this county, and was tested by sceptics, and no "trick" discovered.

Would you have us understand that H. Melville Fay does all that is done at his seances himself, independent of spirit power—and if so, will you tell us how Mr. Fay has blinded up in so secure a manner, and how he manages to get loose so soon, when skeptics have done their best in tying him, and which they pronounced impossible for him to remove, especially, without their detecting it, and carry a violin in the air, thrumming it sometimes six or seven feet from his person, ring bells, etc., and how does he show the "spirit hands?"—How does he do this while the Clairvoyant is watching him, without being detected?

We know nothing of H. M. Fay personally, never having heard of him till he came into Indiana, but if his "manifestations" are not produced by spirits, he has humbugged a good many through this way, and we would like to know how he performs his "tricks," that we may not be humbugged in the future.

Milford, Ill.

REPLY.—With all due respect, we would refer our correspondent to H. Melville Fay for a reply to his questions. He is often before the public, denouncing Spiritualism as an imposition, and claiming that he, himself, is an impostor.

We, several years since, witnessed genuine spirit manifestations in his presence, but at the same seance, he tried to impose upon us with a so-called spirit hand, which, however, was none other than his own flesh, blood and bones.

We deem it quite safe to let a self-convicted impostor work entirely in the ranks of old theology.

Spiritualism is based on truth, and wants no impostors to demonstrate it.

Letter from Mrs. F. A. Logan.

BRO JONES: Please allow me to say to our numerous correspondents through the columns of the JOURNAL, that Miss Hopper and I have dissolved partnership for the present. She has located for a season in Monmouth, Ill., while I am engaged to lecture in some of the principal towns on the line of the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy road.

Churches of the various denominations are opened and filled for my reception. I have given two lectures in the Mormon church, Joseph Smith, Jr., presiding. All are my brothers; all are my sisters; while heaven with its angelic hosts presides over all.

I find a very liberal element and many whole-souled Spiritualists. The JOURNAL with its blessed influence has long been a necessity and comfort to many minds in this place.

Speakers would do well to call here, also at Mendota and Monmouth.

Plano, Ill.

Mrs. Atwood, the Healing Medium.

In another column will be found the advertisement of Mrs. Atwood, a healing medium. She is well vouched for as an old medium of many gifts. She now presents herself to the public for patronage as a healer.

Her husband, an honorable and truthful man, writing in regard to his wife's mediumship, says:

"My wife, Lodema Atwood, was one of the first mediums developed in the country; was the first to communicate by the alphabet and also by table-tipping, long before such a method was made public in any other direction; has foretold a great many coming important events correctly. One half of her face has been illuminated with a bright light in the presence of a number of individuals. This was nine years ago. The promises made to her that in ten years from that time we would see her face entirely illuminated. This we are, or soon will be, anxiously looking for. Her treatment of the afflicted has been with marked success. Her influences are of the best to delineate and give emblems.

Respectfully, ISAAC ATWOOD.

Beauty.

The largest collection of beauty ever published in the United States is afforded in the Parlor Album, advertised in another column. This Album embraces the finest specimens of chromo-lithographs, steel engravings and fine wood engravings ever afforded the public. The American Publishing Company, of Rutland, Vermont, desire an active agent in every town and village, to whom they offer liberal terms. Read the advertisement of PARLOR ALBUM.

SPIRIT TEST.

H. S. Johnson, Medium.

BRO. JONES: The other evening, while my husband was under spirit control, a communication was given by spirits, which they desired should be published. It is; should I please you to publish it in your paper, it would probably confer a favor on the spirit most interested.

COMMUNICATION.

In the spring of 1862 I enlisted in the service of my country, to assist in putting down the rebellion. I lived in the town of Canterbury, N. H. I had just finished a course in college, and was preparing myself for a theological election. I was about five feet, eight inches high, of rather slender build, yet healthy in mind and body; light blue eyes and auburn hair, high intellectual forehead, and, phrenologically considered, a good organization. I had many friends. Soon after I entered the service I attained the rank of Colonel. In the fall of 1863 I was taken prisoner. In about three months I was exchanged and took my place in the ranks again. While in an engagement, soon after my return, I was shot. I was in advance, leading my men. When I fell, the enemy overpowered our boys, and they retreated, while I was trampled underfoot and disfigured beyond recognition. My out-ide garments were taken off by the common soldiers, and I was buried as a nameless soldier.

I desire this communication to be published in some paper, if possible, hoping my family will see it. If I am recognized, I will give my theory of spirit life. GEORGE SMALLEY.

At the time above communication was given, we were unaware that such a town as Canterbury, N. H, existed, and we are still unacquainted, except spiritually, with any person of the name given. We need the JOURNAL, and are interested in all phases of spirit manifestation.

H. S. JOHNSON.

Wautoma, Wis.

MRS. E. C. Benjamin, of Wautoma, Wisconsin vouches for the integrity of the medium. If any one who may read this message shall recognize the spirit as a person whom they knew in this life, he or she will greatly oblige by informing us of the fact.

HARRY BASTIAN.

Letter from "Veritas."

BRO. JONES: Many of us in this place have, for the first time, seen the physical manifestations. Some half-dozen seances have just closed, given by Harry Bastian, and many people have become convinced that there are more things in heaven and earth than they have dreamed of in their philosophy.

The medium left us yesterday morning for Fort Dodge. Our young friend Harry has certainly remarkable powers as a medium, and the sprightly trio of spirits composing his spirit band, the lively Charley, the more sedate George Fox, and the "old maid," as the spirits call her, will never be forgotten by many in Des Moines who have had the pleasure to enjoy an evening in conversation with them. We hope our friends will meet with success wherever their angel band may take them. We parted with them with regret.

We wish a first-rate lady lecturer would come out this way.

Des Moines, Iowa, March 4th.

INDIANA.

Another Preacher Brought to Grief.

Rev. McWilliams, a celebrated M. E. clergyman, was arrested on Feb. 28th, at Rensselaer, Indiana, for stealing a horse and being married to three wives. He was sent to this town early in the winter by the Elder, to assist in conducting a protracted meeting, converting many souls to God, and was about to be married to a very estimable lady, when the above facts became known, and he was arrested by the sheriff of this county, and taken to the county in which he committed the crimes, being also followed by former wives from Pennsylvania.

The people here are terribly shocked and disappointed; but how about the souls converted under the sound of his voice. It is this class of men that denounce honest Spiritualists as free-lovers and Infidels. We are sorry ever to hear of a public educator to be guilty of crime.

M.

REMARKS.—This man, doubtless, made a very fine manager of "protracted meetings." When the philosophy of the success of such gatherings is fully understood, people will not wonder that so many of the preachers are known to be thieves, bigamists, and abortionists. Clarification often follows fermentation. Let them effervesce.

GEORGIA.

Letter from J. M. Ellis.

I have been a medium since last May, and am doing all in my power for the cause. You know how any one will work when they get the true light leaning upon their souls.

My guides think I will be ready for the lecture field in one twelvemonth. Dr. E. Heal, whose soul is as big as all out of doors, is curing the sick here by laying on of hands, and without the aid of medicine. The Davenport Brothers have had four successive successful exhibits here and against considerable threats thereby. The people are beginning to look for "what next?" anxiously; may it be Bastian or Thayer, or perhaps a good lecturer, for whom some of us have prayed long and earnestly, but to no purpose. Perhaps they are afraid to come among us. However, let that be as it may, our spirit friends have promised to raise up lecturers in our midst, and they have always kept their promises so far.

By the way, I had almost forgotten to tell you that I am a developing medium, and have developed several who are getting first rate communications, and are also earnestly working for the cause.

Atlanta, Georgia.

Letter from Chas. M. Higgins.

BROTHER JONES: As I have seen no communication from this city itemized in your excellent paper, and as there are some few of those "crazy people" here, I thought I would write a few words to say that the "Philosophy of Spiritualism" is gaining ground with us, and many are investigating its claims.

Full audiences greeted Mr. Lyman C. Howe for three evenings in February, and all seemed pleased. Last week we had Miss Dou Hopper with us, who gave us four evening seances. She is a speaker and an excellent seeing medium, and gave many very marked tests of spirit presence. We like her very much as a lady, and as a medium. She has made arrangements with the friends at Monmouth (Ill.) for the next two months, where letters for engagements to lecture will reach her. She has our hearty endorsement.

Mendota, Ill., March 13th.

BY.....E. V. WILSON

Discussion Between E. V. Wilson and Rev. Clark Braden.

[Notes taken during a Discussion on the Resolution,—"Resolved, That the Bible, King James' Version, sustains Modern Spiritualism in all its Phases and Teachings."]

E. V. Wilson affirms.—Rev. Clark Braden denies.

7th.—Why does he stop or why does he change the reading of the text? Why not read it complete and full, giving us its full meaning? We answer, because he knew very well that it was damaging his cause and strengthening ours. Now the text reads thus, "Should not a people seek unto their God: for the living people to the dead people? to the law and to the testimony? And if they [the dead] speak not according to the word [law and testimony] it is because there is no light in them." Who? the dead?

8th.—Does this prove that Saul did not see Samuel, or that Samuel did not appear? We say, not by any means. But Samuel tells a different story. Then said Samuel:

"Wherefore, then, dost thou ask of me, seeing the Lord hath departed from thee, and has become thine enemy. And the Lord hath done to him as he spake by me; for the Lord hath rent the kingdom out of thine hand and given it to thy neighbor, even to David; because thou obeyest not the voice of the Lord, nor executed his fierce wrath upon Amalek, therefore hath the Lord done this thing unto thee this day."—1st Sam., 28: 15, 18.

Josephus, in his Jewish Antiquity, refers to the woman of Endor as one of the noblest women of Bible history, and Samuel as the brightest spirit of Biblical authority. In the 5th chapter Tobit, the man Azariah hires out to go a journey for a dram a day; in the 12th chapter and 15th verse declares himself to have been an angel, the angel Raphael.

9th.—We believe the Bible contains a record of what transpired; first, that which took place with the Hebrews among themselves; second, their dealings with other nations; third, that which took place between them and the world of spirits, good and evil; fourth, we believe in one God, a spirit, who must be worshiped in spirit; fifth, we believe that his kingdom is within us; sixth, we believe that when we violate any law of our physical being we receive a physical punishment, and of our spiritual nature we are punished spiritually; 7th, we believe in progression here and hereafter; 8th, we believe in punishments and rewards here and hereafter; 9th, we believe that we should know each other hereafter, and that as spiritual beings we can return and take an active part in the affairs of this world; tenth, we believe in the power of a spirit, good or evil, to benefit us or do us harm; 11th, we believe that man is about as great a devil as there well can be.

Mr. Chairman, the resolution calls not upon me to answer the queries in the question, but to sustain general principles.

SUMMING UP OF FOUR NIGHT'S DISCUSSION.

1st.—The resolution reads as follows:

Resolved, That the Bible, King James' Version, sustains modern Spiritualism, in its teachings and phases.

This resolution confines us to the Bible, King James' Version, and the teachings and phases of modern Spiritualism.

2nd.—Hence, Mr. Braden's disquisitions on the metaphysical views of the various churches of his brethren and of himself—on the Bible—on the Logos of the Old and New Testament—on the Holy Spirit and the word through which the Holy Spirit is given to the church—his brethren—himself—in fact, the sermons he has preached during this discussion, are foreign to the resolution.

3rd.—We have presented you as clear an explanation of the resolution as we could command. First, the Bible, King James' Version, our English edition; second, the word sustains, meaning to keep, to bear out, to maintain—to keep alive and parallel. Hence, when I find any one phase or more of the teachings and phenomena of modern Spiritualism paralleled in the Old and New Testament, that phase of teaching or phenomenon is covered by the resolution; third, teachings means the philosophy, the ethics and generic truths of a creed or principle, an educator—the teacher.

Hence Spiritualism teaches the immortality of man's spiritual nature, the continuity of his individuality and memory of this life in the superior life. That all which exists is spirit or soul.

4th.—We teach the existence of good spirits, as taught in 1st Samuel, 28 h chapter; Matthew, 16th chapter; Luke, 9th chapter; Acts, 9: 1; 1st Chron., 13; Heb., 13; 1st John, 4; Revelations, 1st and 22nd chapters. Does the Bible sustain this phase?

We teach that man is rewarded and punished here and hereafter. Does the Bible sustain this phase?

We teach that man is a progressive being, here and hereafter; we teach that God is a spiritual, sensible being, ever was, ever will be, above, beyond, and greater than mortal or immortal; God the law, and men and angels the phenomena of the law, and if man or angel should ever reach out to, or attain equality with God, then infinitism ceases, and the created and the creator become peers.

We teach that Jesus is just what he claims to be,—the Son of man quickened by the Spirit.

"Whom do men say that I, the Son of Man am, and whom say ye that I am?"—Matt., 16: 13; Luke, 9.

We teach that the Bible contains inspired words. We teach that angels are spirits, and that the spirits of men,—angels in their enfranchised estates,—Acts, 9: 12, 23; 1st. Cor., 13: 13, 14, 15; Eph., 4; Heb., 13; 1st John, 4; Rev., 1, 19, and 22nd chapters; 1st Sam., 28; 2nd Chron., 18; Isaiah, 8; Psa., 104; Amos, 3; Tobit, 5th and 12th chapters.

We teach that "we shall know each other there."—Luke, 9th. Moses and Elias.—Rev., 1, 19 and 22nd chapters, the angel knew John.

We teach that we are influenced by spirits of good and bad, or wicked men. Does not the Bible teach this? We teach that the sick are, can be, and have been healed. We ask the audience if the Bible does not teach and entail the teaching on those that believe on him.

5th.—The physical phenomena we have paralleled.

1st.—Movements of ponderable matter—instance—Elisha's ax; Peter and the spirit at the gate of the prison; Ezekiel, Jesus and Philip carried through the air; the stone rolled away from the tomb.

2nd.—The raps or knocks produced by spirits, as in Acts, 12: 15; "Then said they, it is his angel." Doing what? Knocking at the door.

3rd.—Writing by the spirits influencing the hand, the mind of the seer. "Mene, mene, tekel, upharsin." Jesus writing on the ground as though he heard them not.—John, 8: 6, and all of the book of Revelations written by John under spirit influence.

4th.—Sounds, noises, playing on musical instruments, either dependent on or independent of, the human media. "And there came a voice out of the cloud."—Luke 9: 35. And when "the voice was past," 36. "And he fell to the earth and heard a voice."—Acts, 9: 4. "And the hosts of the Syrians heard a great noise."—2nd Kings, 7: 6. "Suddenly there came a sound from heaven as of a rushing wind."—Acts, 2: 2. "So the people shouted when the priests blew the trumpet—the wall fell down flat."—Josh., 6: 20. "And even things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, [or bell, horn or fiddle, for these are all things] except they give a distinction in sounds, how shall we know what is piped or harped or sounded? For if my unknown tongue is not understood, neither can an uncertain sound be understood."

6th.—Photography, mesmerism, biology, or any other science not known or mentioned in the Bible, but known as scientific facts to-day, and these facts being duplicated by spiritual phenomena, we are not bound to parallel from the Bible; God having no knowledge of them in the days of Adam, Abraham, Moses or Jesus.

8th.—Lying spirits, and lies told by spirits. We hold that the facts are pre-eminently sustained and paralleled in ninety three quotations, the most remarkable of which are, the liar by God's order, to Ahab, 2nd Chron., 18th chapter, and the lie Peter was compelled to speak at the trial of Jesus.

7th.—Seeing the spirits of men who have died. Saul saw Samuel, Ezekiel saw Moses and Joshua, Daniel saw two saints, Job saw a spirit, John Baptist saw Elias, James and John saw Moses and Elias. All the apostles saw Jesus. John saw one of the brethren, and one hundred and forty-four thousand Jews from the twelve tribes, besides an innumerable host of just men made perfect. Does this parallel seeing spirits?

All of these facts I have presented, quoting, in all, over three hundred texts to sustain my position. Not one single point or witness has Mr. Braden done away with or refuted. I have clung to my resolution, not going outside of its strict determination. I have called in no hearsay, no newspaper reports, save referring to Josephus once, and the Bible.

ON THE PART OF MR. BRADEN.

1st.—He concedes the phenomena of modern Spiritualism, for, says he, "I have seen most, if not all of its phases." Does not claim that it is a humbug or credulism, but affirms it to be the result of the spirit in the human body, that is, man's normal spirit acting independent of the body. That is to say, I, not knowing what I am doing, move the table. I being in Chicago in body, and in New York city in spirit, and move a table, having no cognizance of the fact. Well, suppose we admit his, for the sake of the argument. Now ask, can not my spirit produce the same phenomena when unencumbered with the body, for mark you, by Mr. Braden's concession, both spirits are independent of the body or mind in the body.

2nd.—He concedes the sainted dead are sensate, and have a continuous existence, and that they did appear on one or more occasions during Bible history; that the demons and devils of the Old and New Testament were and are the spirits of wicked men, and were used for certain purposes, such as we read of in the Bible.

Very well—we accept this. Now, has he given a single reason why they can not produce the same varieties of phenomena to day that they produced in the Bible? Do not the sainted dead continue to day? Do not the wicked dead continue to-day? Do we not have similar or parallel phenomena to-day as in the past? Are not the good men and women of to day immortal? Are not the wicked men and women of to day immortal? Has not Mr. Braden conceded this? Are the capacities of the immortal good or wicked man less to-day than in the days of the Bible? Then, if not, how can they not do to day on earth what was done in Biblical times under the same law? We answer, yes.

3rd.—Mr. Braden replies the law has been suspended, the phenomena withdrawn, for we have come unto the perfect man, which is the word of God, and to the full communion of the truth through our Lord Jesus Christ, in the unity of the Jew and Gentile.

In support of this belief of his, he reads from 1st Cor., 13: 8, "Charity never faileth; but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away."

Really this chapter is a eulogy on charity, showing it superior to every other virtue in the catalogue of virtues, and any gift without charity shall fail, or fail to the ground. We will now read the first and last verse of the chapter:

"Though I speak with the tongues of angels [spirits] and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."

"And now abideth faith, hope and charity; these three; but the greatest of these is charity."

We ask, when shall these things fail? Mr. Braden replies, "Till we all come in the unity of the faith, and of the knowledge of the Son of God unto a perfect man—unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ."—Eph., 4: 13. Then these things shall fail. Who says so. Clark Braden.

And now, let us look at the authority. Has the perfect man come? Has Jesus returned? Is Satan bound? Has the millenium come—the thousand years that Satan is to be bound? When the reign of the perfect man shall be triumphant throughout the world, then we may expect these signs and gifts to cease, and not before. But we must bear in mind that this belief or say so of Mr. Braden's, is only his opinion, while we have the facts yet with us.

We now hold that Mr. Braden has failed.

1st.—In not following us according to the resolution.

2nd.—In not answering the fact by disproving the material points quoted in support of our position.

3d.—He has lost much valuable time in reading sermons not applicable to the resolution.

4th.—In undertaking to affirm a resolution instead of negating it.

5th.—In giving his opinions instead of authority. His attempt at ridiculing Spiritualism.

Spiritualism a necessity and of God.

Christianity and religion greater than revelation.

The peach when fully ripe drops from the limb and falls to the ground, and has no more need of the air, rain or limb; but until perfectly ripe it needs them all.

So the man when full of perfect knowledge of the tree of life needs no more of its fruits; with him, as with the peach. He falls to the ground, but to arise and reproduce himself in the spheres.

We can have no knowledge of immortal life except the immortal men—not angels—return to tell us.

TO BE CONTINUED.

E. V. Wilson's Appointments for April, 1871.

Will lecture in Wheaton, Du Page County, Ill., on Sunday, April 9th, 1871, at eleven o'clock in the morning, and then at 6 o'clock in the afternoon, commencing sharp time.

The Trustees of the Universalist Society of Wheaton have kindly extended to us the use of their meeting house in which to hold our meetings on this occasion. The friends of Spiritualism in every part of the country will bear in mind that this will be the only opportunity for us to lecture to our friends in Du Page County this spring or summer. Let there be a general turn out. Come with baskets full of good things to eat, and we will rejoice in the truth.

Collections will be taken up at the close of the lectures.

Subject in the morning, "The Testimony of Jesus on Earth and in Heaven"; in the evening, "Our Guests, Seen and Unseen."

Amusements.

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE.

Immense success of the Wyndham Comedy Company, the most complete and powerful comedy combination in the country. Thursday evening, March 30, benefit of Mr. Charles Wyndham, commencing with the comic operetta, "Mephisto's Mission," to be followed by the military comedy drama, "The Lancers." Grand Lancers matinee on Saturday, at 2 P. M.

M'VICKER'S THEATRE.

Friday, benefit, and last performance but two, of Joseph Murray, who will appear in Fred G. Maeder's drama of "Help." New songs, new acts, new specialties—Irish, Dutch and Ethiopian. Rearrangement of the sketches in "Deutscheland." Murphy's Music Lesson—solos on peculiar instruments, every evening and Saturday Matinee. Next week, the popular pugilist, Mr. Frank Mayo.

AIKEN'S MUSEUM.

Frank E. Aiken, proprietor and manager. Friday and Saturday evenings, and Saturday Matinee, last performances of the spectacular drama, "Mephisto; or, the Wild Horse of Tartary." The great Sanyash as Maseppa. To commence with "The Silent Woman." Monday—another great novelty, "The French Spy on Horseback."

[illegible] THEATRE.

[illegible] of the Fate of Sayer," Bob Hart's Stump Speech, Hall's inimitable Dutch act, and last week positively "Fritz Among the World." Monday, April 3rd, benefit of Bob Hart. Nearly ready, "The Century Float."

HOOLEY'S OPERA HOUSE.

89 South Clark street. An entire change of bill. "Pit a pat." Screaming comedy. A new pantomime, a new first part, a new song and dance. "Il Trovatore" Unsworth, Eugene, Rice, Mulligan, Johnson, Powers, Campbell. Look out for the great sensation, 'Cinderella."

CHICAGO ACADEMY OF DESIGN.

66 Adams street, open daily from nine in the morning to five in the afternoon, and during the evenings of Tuesday, Thursday and Saturday, from seven to nine o'clock. A fine collection of oil paintings constantly on hand. Bunner's Colorado just received. Admission twenty five cents. To all lovers of the beautiful we would say that nowhere in the city can they spend an afternoon or evening more pleasantly and profitably than at the Academy of Design.

METROPOLITAN HALL.

Monday, March 27, second week of Professor Martin. One hundred presents given away every night. Admission, 25 cents; reserved seats, 50 cents. Grand Matinee Saturday afternoon. Every child will receive a present. Admission 20 cents, to all parts of the house.

Mrs. A. H. Robinson.

The above named justly celebrated healing medium continues to heal the sick by the use of the positive and negative forces in nature, imparted to her by spirit power, to an extent almost miraculous.

By a perusal of her advertisement in another column, the directions to be observed in writing her for a diagnosis and prescription, will be readily understood. She never fails in giving a true diagnosis of disease, and her prescriptions perform a most speedy cure. The magnetic paper, which she sends by letter, evidently brings the circle of spirits, which control her, en rapport with the sick person, which enables them to operate directly, as if yet in the form, and with all the increased potency of spirit power.

As small men in the "Regular Schools" of physicians war against, in like proportion, the healing powers of mediums are increased. So we may well say to these gentlemen, "Lay on, Macduff, and d——d be he who first cries, Hold! Enough!"

Two Children.

A respectable widow lady, the mother of two beautiful sprightly children, a girl aged eleven, and a boy of thirteen years, desires to find a home for them for one year, at least, in view of a permanent home if all are suited, with a nice family or families, of Spiritualists, in the country, where these children will be looked after and schooled with loving, parental care, and with an eye single to teaching them the importance of early industrious habits. Address Mrs. Clark, care of this office.

Appointments.

Dumont C. Dake, M. D., from the analytical care, 211 Wabash Ave., will visit Beloit, Wis., Friday, April 7th; Goodman House, Rockford, Illinois, Saturday and Sunday, April 8th and 9th; Elgin, Illinois, Monday and Tuesday, April 10th and 11th; balance of month at 211 Wabash Avenue, Chicago.

Developing Medium.

Mrs. Abbott, the old veteran, well-tried and most acceptable developing medium, has returned to this city, and taken rooms directly opposite the JOURNAL office. Those desirous of becoming developed as mediums will do well to give her a call.

No P. O. Address.

We are in receipt of two letters, one from J. D. Silliman, and the other from A. Hoyt, both send money to apply on subscriptions, and both fail to give their post office address. Please send your address, gentlemen, and we will attend to your business for you.

NEW EDITION—REVISED AND CORRECTED.
THE VOICES
Three Poems.
VOICE OF SUPERSTITION.
VOICE OF NATURE.
VOICE OF A PEBBLE.
By Warren Sumner Barlow.
THIS volume is startling in its originality of purpose, and is destined to make deeper inroads among sectarian bigots than any work that has hitherto appeared.
THE VOICE OF SUPERSTITION takes the creeds at their word, and proves by numerous quotations from the Bible that the God of Moses has been defeated by Satan, from the Garden of Eden to Mount Calvary!
THE VOICE OF NATURE represents God in the light of Reason and Philosophy—in His unchangeable and glorious attributes. While others have too often only demolished, it is author has erected a beautiful Temple on the ruins of Superstition. Judge Baker, of New York, in his review of this poem, says: "It will unquestionably cause the author to be classed among the ablest and most gifted didactic poets of the age."
THE VOICE OF A PEBBLE delineates the individuality in matter and Mind, fraternal Charity and Love.
The book is a repository of original thoughts, awaking noble conceptions of God and man, forcible and pleasing in style, and is one of the few works that we I grow with its years and matures with the centuries. It is already admired by its thousands of readers.
Printed in beautiful type, on heavy, fine paper, bound in beveled boards, in good style; nearly 300 pages. Price $1.25, postage 16 cents. Very liberal discount to the trade.

SECOND EDITION.
A WORK OF GREAT RESEARCH.
ONE RELIGION: MANY CREEDS.
BY ROSS WINANS.
"We object to what the Church demands, an unbounded and unjustifiable confidence in the infallibility of the writings of Moses and the prophets, and the Evangelists and the Apostles. We object to the practical attachment to an impossible compound of God and man. We protest that Christian theology, as we have it, is not taught by God himself, nor by Christ himself, nor is it consistent with established facts, nor is it comprehensible by our reason. We would show you that Christianity, as taught among us, is no better than other systems taught in other than Christian countries, and in some respects not so good.
The historic part of the Bible, in relation to the creation of the world, has its counterpart also in the several systems of theology here mentioned. They all had their cosmologies based on equally good authority and equally wide of the truth, as that recorded in the Bible. The time and manner of the creation, no man has ever known, or ever will know in this life; nor is such knowledge of importance in preparing us for the life to come."—EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.
This book is a large 12 mo. of nearly 400 paces, printed on fine, heavy tint'd paper, and is sold at much less than the actual cost. Price, $1.50; postage, 32 cents.

THE CELEBRATED
CRAIG MICROSCOPE
Is an optical wonder; reveals the thousands of hidden wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies
TEN THOUSAND TIMES,
a power equal to other microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which, to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of Eyes in the Single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.
It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers and to students, but nowhere is it of greater value than on the family table, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children and friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanliness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, &c.
It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer
in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child can use it understandingly and with appreciation.
A Beautiful Present, Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 20,000 sold.
During the past six years its worth has been testified to by Thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.
PRICE $3.00.—Sent by Mail, Post-paid;
Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labeled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sent by mail.

THE BIBLE IN THE BALANCE.
A Book for the Age and the Times,
and one that should be in the hands of every liberal man and woman in the land.
You want it for your own instruction, that you may be furnished with acknowledged authority to meet the arguments of the theologian, historian, chronologist and scientific man with his own weapons.
It discusses the matter of Bible canons, versions, translations and revisions with ability, citing none but authors in the highest repute, and those that are above criticism.
The book is printed in excellent style, 12 mo., on new type and fine paper, with beautiful illustrations of the mounds and mound-relics of the Mississippi Valley.
It is substantially bound in cloth and contains three hundred and twenty pages.
The interest felt in the work is so great that orders were received for nearly the whole of the first edition before it was published, one party alone having received orders for over three hundred copies.
Price, $1.50; postage, 20 cents.

ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM.
A MANUAL OF
SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY
By Hudson Tuttle.
WITH PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR. PRICE $2.00; Postage 24c.
This work embodies the results of the author's researches and experience during the past twenty years, and is, without doubt, the most thorough presentation of the subject of Modern Spiritualism before the public.
Dealing, as it does, with a question in which the interest of all mankind is centered, it cannot fail to command universal attention.
While the experience of thousands will repudiate some of the conclusions the author arrives at, they will still be able to obtain much invaluable information from the book. It is a good book to place in the hands of every person who would know more of what it is that is making the world to new hopes and aspirations, and planting a tree of life beside every man's door.

A BOOK FOR WOMEN;
TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,
BY
MRS R. B. GLEASON, M.D.
A book by a woman, for women, on the diseases of the sex. The LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, speaking of the book says:
"After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had of its class. It is written in a pure vein; it is full of wise counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people most need assistance. It is a safe book for young people to read, for any body to lend, and this can be said of very few books devoted to such subjects. There is not a sentence in it that can be perverted or misused, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country."
Harper's Magazine says:
"We wish the chapter 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land."
Mrs. Dr. Sales says:
"I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"
Godey's Lady's Book says:
"This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class we have yet seen."
Price, $1.50; postage, 16 cents. Address RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 189 S. Clark street, Chicago.

THE HIEROPHANT,
OR
Gleanings from the Past.
BY G. C. STEWART.
"Being an exposition of Biblical astronomy, and the symbolism and mysteries on which were founded all ancient religious and secret societies, with an explanation of the dark sayings and allegories that abound in the Pagan, Jewish and Christian Bibles, also the real sense of the doctrines and observances of the modern Christian churches."
The above is a good deal to promise the reader that he will find done up in a neat little 16 mo. book of 284 pages, but we assure our readers that they will find all the subjects mentioned treated in a clear, concise, and satisfactory manner.
The book has already passed through several editions, and the demand, of late, has greatly increased.

THE CORONET.

BY ELIZA A. PITTSINGER.

Read before the Woman's Suffrage Association of San Francisco.

Oh, sisters of my noble clime!
I list the sound, I hear the strains;
I set them to an earnest rhyme,
And sing their numbers o'er the plains!
And in each measure I would tell—
And to thy noble cause would flee,
With words whose earnest raptures swell
The silver chimes of destiny!

Oh, ye, the strong and ever brave,
How regal in your high estate,
With hands to work, and deeds to save
The glory of my Golden State!
I list the sound of many a land,
I hear the strains from many a clime,
Whose music teaches me to stand
And wait the bi-ssed rounds of time!

Exultant in my woman's pride,
My spirit can but gladly sing,
While yet upon the surging tide
Of prophecy I fondly bring,
Whose rays are like the morning light,
With pearls and flashing opals set,
And oh, so pure, resplendent, bright—
A diamond-crested coronet!

Ye locks of raven and of brown,
Ye waving auburn, matron-gray,
And silver-white! how well the crown
Will suit you on that harvest-day!
Ah, me! the opals—how they shine!
I'd rather wear them on my brow
Than all the jewels of the mine,
To which the servile mill lons bow.

No bride that blushes in the land,
With robes of trailing, silken white,
I ween, is half so brave to stand
As ye, the pioneers of right!
Ah, rather than a blushing bride
Or tasteless matron would I be
A priestess, bearing o'er the tide
A boon whose love would make us free!

Oh, matrons, as ye brave the strait
Of human rights and human wrongs,
Like some lone wanderer I stand
Encompassed with unwritten songs.
And as the gems on this new page,
Emblazoned on each shining page,
Ah, well,—I understand the creed
That binds me to a better age.
Oh, sisters of my noble clime,
Imperial in your queenly might!
With you I bide the harvest-time—
With you I sing of equal right!
With you I join an earnest hand—
With you in pati nce, work and wait—
Until baside you I may stand
Again beyond the Golden Gate.

As long as Hesper rhods her light
O'er mountain-peak and flowery plain,
O'er lawn and valley blushing bright
With luscious fruit and golden grain;
As long as those sweet stars that shine
Serenely down upon her shore,
Then will I count her glories mine,
And sing their praises o'er and o'er!

Ah, yes! so long as those sweet rays
To noble thoughts and deeds inspire
That noble band, then will I raise
The numbers of a slumbering lyre!
For oh, what theme so broad and grand—
So lovely in its own pure light—
As that by which we bravely stand
By human love and human right?

SPIRITUALISM.

Talks With Spirits—Visits Among the Mediums and Astrologers—Physical Demonstrations and Sleight-of-Hand Tricks—Unsatisfactory Results—Protest of a Spiritualist—Irrepressible Conflict Between Orthodox and Spiritualistic Ideas—One Satisfactory Demonstration.

STATUS IN LOUISVILLE.

Conflicts of opinion among great classes of the community are deeply interesting. They should be rightly understood, so that their force and significance for good or ill may be duly appreciated. There is nothing gained by underestimating the number of those who hold an erroneous and pernicious belief, nor by stating the views and opinions of such persons otherwise than as they wish them presented.

MEETING.

The Rev. Dr. Robinson may say that the church must preach the gospel, and not fight scientific or spiritualistic skepticism, on the ground that such skepticism selects for the contest.

The Pope, in his recent bull of infallibility, may say:

"If any one shall say that it may at any time come to pass, in the progress of science, that the doctrines set forth by the Church must be taken in another sense than that in which the Church has ever received and yet receives them, let him be anathema." Hence all the Christian faithful are not only forbidden to defend as legitimate conclusions of science, those opinions which are known to be contrary to the doctrine them for errors wearing a deceitful appearance of truth."

But if Spiritualism is to be successfully met, it must be opposed at the point where it makes its attacks. Its assertions must be refuted, its fallacies exposed, its ruinous consequences clearly shown.

HOW IT IS MET.

There is no more effectual way of checkmating a spiritualistic medium who professes to have knots tied or untied without manual means than an exposure of him using his hands for the purpose, or the performance of the same trick by professional sleight-of-hand jugglers. When in a darkened room spirits are supposed to be performing on musical instruments, the sudden opening of a dark-lantern, showing the medium beating and blowing vigorously, is a very effectual exposure of their trickery and humbug. So the blacking the mouths of wind instruments, and after supposed Spiritualist performances, finding the mouth of each medium blacked was a pretty complete exposure. But the short coming in these cases was that while the experiment proved that those mediums were dishonest deceivers, it did not prove that other performances of the same sort were all fraudulent humbugs any more than the detection of a few bad half-dollars would prove that all hard money is spurious. These exposures did not materially check the growth of Spiritualism in the places where they occurred. A recent number of the leading quarterly review in this country, contained an article to show that there is no evidence that spirits ever do communicate or do move material substances, and it explained supposed phenomena by attributing them to imagination and erroneous nervous sensations. The chief difficulty in the way of this refutation is that it tends to encourage skepticism in Bible accounts, that spirits talked with many different persons, and on many occasions did exert force to move material substances.

Those known as orthodox Christians have, now-a-days, three principal modes of confronting Spiritualism. Some denounce it as infidelity, and its results as subversive of social order and morality, and perilous to souls. Others brand it as imposture, and all the phenomena as deception through the imagination, diseased nerves, sleight-of-hand, or magnetism. Others still admit that some of the phenomena of Spiritualism are really what they purport to be, communications from, or acts by spirits, but that the spirits who thus communicate are always evil, and that intercourse with them is contrary to the Bible, wicked and dangerous. The late Rev. Alex. Campbell, a great and good man, held this latter opinion, and once wrote a little book in elucidation of his views. It is presumed that his opinions now are even more positive than when his pamphlet was written.

Regarding the numbers and positions of Spiritualists as matters of general interest, one of the reporters of The Commercial has devoted some time to an investigation of the subject.

NUMERICAL FORCE.

Spiritualism is a popular movement. It began about twenty-three years ago, and throughout the country its adherents probably out-number now, not only those of any Evangelical Church, but those of any denomination of Christians. Spiritualists hold that all men are bound before or after death, to believe as they do, and hence are not generally zealous to proselyte in haste; and as organizations are mainly to make proselytes, the Spiritualists are not active in forming them. They have occasional circles where inquirers can meet, and it is part of the Spiritualistic creed that any number of inquirers may for themselves, and without public action, investigate the subject of Spiritualism.

Two or three persons can pursue inquiries, they say, even more satisfactorily than a church of hundreds could. From these circumstances it results that the number of Spiritualist organizations or of public circles, is no indication of the number of actual or avowed Spiritualists. A person is to be fairly classed as a Spiritualist who believes that some of the communications through mediums are from disembodied spirits—that in the main such communications have a good effect, and that spiritual existence and development goes on from whence this life ends. There are many members of churches who hold, more or less strongly, such views, and of the five-elevenths of the adult population of Louisville, who do not attend church services, there is doubtless a large majority who are Spiritualists. The Rev. Dr. Robinson says:

"In our day Infidelity in its conscious weakness seizes hold desperately of the hand of mystery and imposture."

When a prominent Spiritualist came to this city on a visit, a short time ago, he was in one day called on by one hundred and seventeen persons, many of them inquirers, who were among the most intelligent and respectable people of the city. Within a little over a year, one medium has been called on by sixteen clergymen of five different denominations, and every one of these ministers went away satisfied that the demonstrations were from spirits. Some of them belonging to Evangelical churches avowed an intention to withdraw from the orthodox ministry and devote themselves to the spread of Spiritualism. Many would doubtless do so if Spiritualists would give them the material support that they would require to enable them to live. The only place where, in the West, any thing of this sort is yet attempted, is, we believe, at Du Quoin, Illinois, where there are several hundred Spiritualists in one association, which has for its objects mainly the teaching of youth and the cultivation of science, though it is about to call the Rev. Mr. Fishback to serve as pastor and lecture on moral and spiritual subjects.

The physical demonstrations are reported to be such as to test credulity to the utmost. Our reporter tried to see them but could not. He saw cases where persons were psychologized and made to believe that they were hot—were cold—could not sit down—could not rise from their chairs—and many other things at the will of the psychologizer. There was no doubt of the fact, that they actually thought what he wanted them to think. Children, three or four years of age, were made to believe that the room was filled with tubs full of, and trees covered with, oranges, and when they came out of the psychologized state they looked about in wonder, and wanted to know where the oranges were. Two young men were in one case made to believe that the house was on fire, and they hurt themselves bodily in trying to escape. All this was to us perfectly inexplicable. How one mind could control another thus, was beyond our understanding.

The operator took a number of persons and seated them together. He then gave each some small object to hold, apparently to fix the attention. In a few minutes he walked about and opened the eye of each, and examined the pupil. This showed some change of condition which enabled him to select subjects, and from the whole number present he selected perhaps a third, who were suitable subjects, and these he soon had under control and made to believe all he wished. Some would be apparently, and others partially, hypnotized like a chicken made to look for a few minutes at a certain angle along a white line on a green board, goes into a sort of sleep. This curious condition and its incidents could perhaps be attributed to imagination, characteristics of mind not yet understood, or nervous influence. We don't pretend to explain or account for it, but were not impressed that it had any thing to do with spirits.

The physical demonstrations of table tipping, chairs running about, and the like, we were disposed to attribute to the same cause. That is, we supposed that the persons alleging that chairs moved about, and tables performed strange antics, really thought so, but were psychologized and held that belief. One lady who lives in Jeffersonville, told us of a fable that chased her about a room on one occasion, and would have knocked her bodily, but for her getting into a closet, whose door it banged furiously, until she called for assistance. One old gentleman had been seated on a heavy table that carried him through the large parlors. A lady had seen a stand dance, and yet one leg had been a cushion, and recent a person taking hold to relieve it. These individuals believed that spirits were, in these cases, themselves power, but they may have been psychologized, whatever that is. We did not see any of these physical demonstrations, but were assured by many that they are exceedingly common. They are met with in hundreds of houses in and about this city.

EXHIBITIONS.

There is a class of Spiritualist exhibitors who make money by their operations, but there are none of them here except two or three fortune telling astrologers. In some places they are numerous. Many of them are great rascals. They profess clairvoyance or seeing, by the aid of spirits, things past, present and future. They profess to have read letters come upon their arms in answer to questions. They profess to deliver to spirits in the spirit world the gold rings, etc., handed to them by their dupes. They profess to read letters without opening them—to know what is going on in widely distant places and many like things. All of these that we have seen were in our opinion humbugs, but that there may be persons who have through spirits extraordinary powers, it would be rash to deny. Samuel, the prophet, knew that the asses that Saul was hunting had been found.

MEDIUMS.

Spiritualis's hold that by development all persons may become mediums, and that communications depend on the character of the medium and the degree of development of the medium. There are not in or about Louisville any professional mediums who exhibit for money, but there are several who have a high degree of development. In a very large majority of cases the only phenomena are physical, as the movement of chairs, the tipping of tables and the like.

Spiritualists claim that even these, by demonstrating intelligent disembodied existence may do much good and popularize the belief of the immortality of the soul, thus refuting materialism. They attribute the character of the communications to either the condition of the medium or to the limited capacity of the spirit wishing to communicate. Thus they say that in the absence of a knowledge of letters a spirit must rap out in answer to interrogatories what it wishes to communicate. Several of the most noteworthy mediums in this part of the country are ladies of the highest respectability and best social position. One is the sister of an Evangelical clergyman. Several of these ladies have been known from infancy by hundreds of our best citizens, who regard them as irreproachable in character, and as utterly incapable of consenting to any fraudulent deception. They are in good circumstance—the mothers of families. Their mediumship is of no pecuniary advantage, and often subjects them to inconvenience by the calls made upon their time. They make no effort to explain the phenomena, which, in many cases are under circumstances that preclude all explanations by imagination, diseased nerves, sleight-of-hand, magnetism, and every thing else but what they purport to be, the work of spirits.

A VISIT TO A MEDIUM.

Our reporter paid a visit recently to a lady medium. He was accompanied by several gentleman and ladies, some of whom were known to the mediums. The reporter had previously seen numerous humbugs, and was skeptical in relation to Spiritualist phenomena. He had seen very singular psychological experiments, and believed that Spiritualist phenomena could be explained by that, by imagination, by fraud, or by animal magnetism. What he wanted to see was a communication from spirits under such conditions that it could only come from disembodied intelligence. The lady medium was the one referred to above as the sister of an Evangelical clergyman. She lives on a farm a few miles in the country. She is a fat, good-humored woman, of sanguine, nervous temperament, with a worthy husband, a family of children and numerous household duties. She is not by any means a woman of very weak nerves, and though sensible and well informed, is not remarkably intellectual, but a healthy, busy, bustling, middle-aged, domestic sort of woman, who all the time that she was holding the seance was chatting good-humoredly on indifferent topics, or giving directions to her children, or answering questions.

She is still a member of an Evangelical church, and her pastor believes fully in the verity of the communications, but don't like to talk much upon the subject. In response to a request that she would favor us with an opportunity for investigation, she at once sat down, and, in less than a minute, intelligent responses were received. They were strange and unaccountable, except on the supposition that they were somehow written by the medium, one of whose hands could not be seen, and this supposition was entirely at variance with the character of the medium. As if to remove this doubt, however, the medium stated that sometimes communications had been received in a still more satisfactory manner, and, though it was not certain they would then occur, she would make the trial.

There was then given

AN ENTIRELY SATISFACTORY DEMONSTRATION.

This and the circumstances we will endeavor to explain.

It was broad daylight, perhaps between three and four o'clock in the afternoon. The room had four doors and two windows in it, and as the day was warm all the doors and windows were thrown open to secure coolness and ventilation. A little common stand was brought in and placed in the middle of the room, which was not the parlor but an ordinary family room, and was carpeted. All present could see and examine every part of this little stand and the carpet. There was absolutely nothing to facilitate deception. One can see under and about the stand—can lift it up—examine every part, and set it in any place that he pleases. On the room are children playing with young chickens, servants getting directions about household affairs, and bringing cool water to some of the visitors, the lady medium, who talks freely on all subjects to the visitors and her children. A common woolen shawl is brought in and thrown over the stand; all can look under it on the floor. A little slate is handed up, washed perfectly clean, and a short pencil placed upon it. No person is near the stand except the medium, who is seated on one side near it. There is a wide clear space on all the other sides of the stand. The medium takes the little slate that is handed to her, and placing it under the stand and inside the shawl, she holds it there by the hand which is outside the shawl, which is thus between her fingers and the slate. Her other arm rests on the back of the chair, and both her arms, hands and fingers are within the sight of all in the room. Her fingers are to be seen outside the shawl and never to move a particle. The medium and the visitors chat, she answers several questions put to her, cautions her children not to hurt the little chickens, jocularly tells one of the visitors that on a certain day she (the medium) will pay her a visit, and what the dinner has to be. Several minutes have elapsed, when some one suggests that the spirit is writing. All listen. The medium thinks not. In a minute more scratching on the slate can be heard. Soon it ceases, and three little taps are given with the pencil on the slate, and the pencil drops as an intimation that the communication is completed. The slate is taken out, and on it are, as the case may be, from two to thirty lines of writing, the perfect fac simile of the writing of the deceased person from whose spirit the writing purports to come. The writing is made from the side opposite to that at which the medium sits, and is thus upside down to her. Sometimes the pencil when writing is heard to move slowly, feebly and hesitatingly, and at others boldly and rapidly. Sometimes the writing will be fine and neat, sometimes very awkward and poor, but always exactly like the writing of the person from whose spirit it purports to come.

The communications, as given in this case, are about equal to the ordinary run of conversation in respectable families. Some of them express pleasure or regret; some are responses to inquiries; some give reasons for opinions; some are jocular and some sentimental. The communications are said to vary in character as much as the spirits from whom the communications come, or the conversation of the people to whom they are sent. The spirits that communicate through this medium are just such as one would expect to find about a nice, respectable family. Among them are some purporting to be girls' acquaintances, who died years ago. A message that assumes to come from one of these is addressed to one of the visitors, and says: "When you go home, tell J——that I knew he was sick." No one had mentioned the sickness of the person referred to. One of the visitors, who had in charge a little orphan girl, received what purported to be a communication from the girl's mother. He then asked whether the girl had better be sent to school the ensuing session, and the response from the spirit was "I think not, she studies too hard." She said the medium didn't think girls did that. The spirit of a boy who died some time ago sent a message. Some who were at the seance began to talk about the boy's live for fun when in the body, and the boy spirit as if recalling its old freaks, wrote a verse of doggrel, that those who knew him in the body recollected he had composed when his mother, who was a widow, was courted by her present husband. This led some one to recall an occasion when the spirit of the boy made a caricature of his step-father, and as if to show his identity when the slate came out a minute or two afterwards, it had on it a rough picture of a rabbit.

The seance was kept up until 6 o'clock P. M. When that hour arrived a message came on the slate, "It is 6 o'clock," which sure enough it was. This was an intimation that no more messages could be received, as it seems this is an invariable rule with the spirits communicating by this medium.

At this seance the communications received, when the medium held the slate by her hand under the shawl, might possibly be supposed to be the result of some trickery, and that the writing was done in some wonderful and unaccountable manner by the medium or a confederate with indiscernible machinery under the carpet or in the stand; but no such explanation, nor any theory of psychology, animal magnetism, diseased nerves, imagination or anything else than attributing it to spirits could account for the prompt writing of intelligent communications in the manner we have described, when the hands of the medium were in plain sight, in broad daylight, and the slate was held with the shawl between it and the hand holding it.

INCIDENTS.

The lady medium informed us that in some cases the spirits had written on the slate when it was placed in a drawer in the stand and her hands were away from the stand, but she seemed to regard this as exceptional, and not to be ordinarily expected. The writing is done with equal facility in any house and with any table, but always in broad day light, before six o'clock in the afternoon. The husband can get no communications. A little boy four or five years old, who scarcely knows his letters, can hold the slate and get communications. A pleasant faced little girl of nine or ten can sometimes get communications, but a girl of twelve or thirteen has often tried, and the spirits won't write when she holds the slate. The spirits will write sometimes for one of the colored servants in the family. The whole family regard the presence of spirits as a matter of course with them, and receive communications from them as they would from neighbors and visitors in the body. The medium says that having attended several circles about two years ago, she soon afterward discovered that she was a medium, and since then there has been a growing development. She dislikes newspaper or other notoriety, and to gratify her, her name is suppressed. The family say that the voices of spirits can often be heard and sometimes their forms seen, but the presence of spirits is so much a matter of course with them that no alarm is felt. It must not be supposed that the family are nervous or weak-minded. They are the very reverse of this, but are especially distinguished for plain, unaffected kindliness. The communications are just such as would be expected from the ordinary associates of such a family. Nine out of ten persons, ministers and laymen, who have attended the seances of this lady medium have gone away fully convinced that the writing on the slate was done by one or more spirits. If this is admitted, the battle between Evangelical Christianity, and Spiritualism will mainly turn upon the character of the communications received by spirits and their effects. The issue will be, whether the messages are demoniac in their origin and wicked and soul-destroying in their nature.

Since writing the foregoing a truthful gentleman states that he has seen the slate placed in a stand drawer with the medium holding on from outside the almost closed drawer and her hands clear and entirely visible and at once the writing could be heard. When taken out there would be on the slate a message from some spirit in a fac simile of the writing of the person from whose spirit the writing assumed to come. A recent newspaper writer who was present at a daylight seance says: "To longer doubt the fact that the spirits of the departed can and do come back and do converse with their friends on earth, would be to throw the lie in the face of my own experience. Some may think that evil spirits or demons might readily personate the spirits of departed mortals. Whether they do so can be in some degree judged from the character of the communications and the theories of Spiritualists drawn from such sources.

THE COMMUNICATIONS.

The communications are certainly no worse or more foolish than the ordinary conversation of the men and women of our times. They are indeed a little better. They generally advise good conduct and morality. Many of them are certainly not such advice as we would expect devils to give. One said recently, "Mother, never fear death. If you make your peace on earth before you go, then it will be one of your happiest moments." Another said, "The battle is over, the victory won, and I have not suffered much." None of the communications are worse than the conversations of some living people. They generally teach that spirits of our deceased friends are about us while we are alive, and see all our acts, and that they grieve when we do wickedly or harm others, and rejoice when we do well. These communications are all reflections of the ideas of our time. They show too, that if spirits wrote them, such spirits have still many of the weaknesses and prejudices which

THE ANSWER—A REVIEW OF DR. FAHNESTOCK'S THEORY.

By J. M. Bailey.

A correspondent asks: "How would you answer the question in Dr. Fahnestock's article on 'Somnambulism,' in RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, of Nov. 19th, 1870?' That question is: "Did magnetism put this subject into this condition?" It has reference to an interesting experiment which is related in said article. The subject, it appears, by reference to said article, was a "gentleman," who, "in the commencement of his sitting, exhibited no signs of being susceptible, and I strove in vain, by diverting his mind in the usual way to different places, at home and abroad, far and near, but, all to no purpose." After the lapse of considerable time, the Doctor's attention was recalled to this subject, when he says:

"To my astonishment, I found him in a most perfect state of somnambulism, and unusually clairvoyant."

Detail of some of the very interesting experiments (together with a statement of their verification) with the subject, follows, as also, the length of time consumed in entering the state, and the declaration of the gentleman, that "before he lost himself, or became unconscious of his surroundings, he felt as if there was fire under him, but that he soon after fell into the most delightful, restful, peaceful state as light as air, and gloriously happy." The Doctor then adds:

"I have but further to remark, that in this case, all the usual means to induce the conditions failed, and he fell into the state through fatigue, as is often done in the natural way, but as his mind was upon me from the commencement of his sitting, he heard me when I spoke to him, without rousing out of the condition."

The italics in this quotation, we introduce. Then follows an opinion by the Doctor, and the question referred to us by a friend—quoted by us in first paragraph of this article—and the remark, that "If so, it must be a kind that acts independent of the operator, and which has been overlooked by the magnetist in the art." Our correspondent then announces, that he has "many other big guns in store, to bring into position against this breeder of evil, * * * * *."

You may expect a rich expose before I get through with it."

If we understand Brother Fahnestock's position upon these mental phenomena, he holds that all are independent of the action and influence of the mind and will of other individual or individuals, than that of the subject of them. If we understand the import of language, the logic of that portion of his statement of the recited case, in italics, completely upsets his theory. The fact that this subject was so nicely en rapport with the Doctor, that the latter improved conclusively, that the subject was carried into the beautiful state of clairvoyance by the evolution of mind-magnetism, emanated from the brain of the Doctor. And the results as cited in said narration,—the seeing of objects in the house of a neighbor which were not known to be there, either by said neighbor, the subject, or other visible persons,—proves, to our satisfaction, that disembodied individual or individuals—mind and will, individualized in a higher embodiment—acted in concert with the will, a portion of the time; and with those subtle mind-forces emanated by the Doctor, which we may as well call magnetism as by any other name, all the time; resulting, finally in the beautiful phenomena recited by our good Brother.

We believe the issue made by Brother Fahnestock, an important one; that the mental phenomena of Spiritualism, in all the varied phases, are resultant from the operation of a universal law of mind; that knowledge of the operation of that law—the media, combinations, relations and sources,—is essential to the more rapid and rational progress of the cause of Spiritualism.

We also believe, that while the Philosophy of Life,—the grand teachings of Modern Spiritualism upon the science of life and the religion of nature,—is the crowning design and superior purpose of those translated minds who endeavor to instruct and elevate us, the so-called phenomena are the means—"the agencies"—by which the noble purpose is to be reached; and hence, are to the fruit—the crowning design—what the elements and forces of nature are to all organic forms and conditions of individualized life. That the law of mind involved in these phenomena is susceptible of scientific solution, but that we can only approximate to an understanding of the elements and forces, or the modus operandi thereof. Therefore, although our language, in the discussion of the issue, may seem dogmatic, it is to be understood that our "spirit and intent" is far from it. We discuss only in the déhire of progress—the uncovering of truth. We believe that is the highest and only wish of Brother Fahnestock. We long for that era

"When all shall lend a willin ear
To doctrines new and still untried,
And pause awhile, ere they condemn,
To learn the truths of either side;
Then, may be heard the better song.
'You may be right, I may be wrong.'"

But, if we do not mistake, Bro. Fahnestock tells us that "Animal Magnetism" is not involved in the aforesaid phenomena. If he means to be understood, that animal magnetism does not direct and control the issues involved, then there is, we think, "more to dispute" him; but if, as we understand him to teach, he affirms that a nerve-magnetic fluid or force in not an agent in the work, then we respectfully dissent therefrom. We understand the Doctor to affirm that no will or mind-force or function outside of the subject, is involved in these phenomena; that it is nothing but "somnambulism!" that the "somnambulic state is always involved, in all the mental phenomena, from the trance—conscious (usually termed impressional), semi-conscious or unconscious—through all the varied phases, including clairvoyance, etc.—to the highest inspirational condition, including "healing," as well.

But our sage fails to tell us what somnambulism is. He certainly does not intend to convey the idea of a sleep-walker, the usual application of the term; for none of the other phases absolutely involve sleep-walking. But we believe that sleep-walking or somnambulism does involve magnetic sympathy, between the mind of the subject and mind outside of the individual somnambulized. We believe that the Doctor has mistaken an effect for a cause. The effect, he deifies into a cause! And he, seemingly, ignores the agent—magnetism or nerve-fluid—through which the cause, mind, ultimates the effect. For he tells us, in effect, that neither the magnetism or the mind of outside individuals, is involved in the phenomena.

It behooves Bro. Fahnestock to give us a more lucid solution of the law, the nature of the forces, and the modus operandi of the wonderful work involved in the phenomena, which, he claims, is nothing but somnambulism! Surely if he is so certain of being "right," while all opposing theories are "wrong," he must know the nature and modes of this alpha and omega of occult entity. We presume that the secret thereof is one of the "big guns" our earnest brother promises us.

Now, we claim that not a single example—phenomena—which our astute philosopher has yet presented, as illustrating his theorem, but can be reconciled with the theory we maintain, namely: that a nerve-magnetic fluid or force is the agent or element, and, mind the cause, by and through which all mental phenomena, called mesmerism, psychology, trance, inspiration, clairaudience, clairvoyance, inspiration, "clairvoyance" or clairperception, is ultimated; and that every case can be rationally accounted for by this solution; while the somnambulic theory makes many cases, recited as examples by the Doctor, only the more mysterious, and his conclusions often absolutely inconsistent with the plain logic of their teachings; also, that in "healing" there is an exchange of this nerve-vital force or element.

We further claim that the transition and exchange of this invisible substance does not always depend upon physical contact,—is both voluntary and involuntary in its action,—and may be interchanged between individuals of both spheres of life—the so-called embodied and disembodied—as also between those of either sphere. Hence, it is not safe for any philosopher to say, that the subject—this phenomena—cannot be, in the least, influenced by animal magnetism, or the mind of outside individuals; for even the Doctor may emit an unconsciously emanated magnetic force, and exert an involuntary influence upon the special subject in question, of the force, magnetism, and will may emanate and proceed from invisible individuality, which the good Doctor, it would seem, has not the acute sensitiveness to cognize.

The Doctor cites cases to show that only the mind—the belief—of patients, is involved in the cure of disease. In an article published in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, Vol. IX, No. 21, he states a case of the cure of warts, and the claim is, that "the desire, belief, will,—while in a somnambulic state,—was the sole cause of the cure. If it really be that one's own will or belief, while in the "somnambulic state," is so much more potent than when normal, there must be connected therewith, a grand underlying fact or principle—agent. Will the Doctor be so good as to enlighten us as to the agent and cause underlying this potent cause; but he tells us that one has only to believe, desire, and will this mystical agency—cause—into power, perseveringly, and it is yours. We are sorry to be obliged to testify that many an earnest, reverent individual has observed the condition s laid down by him, but utterly failed in the effort. But we can cite many instances where we have been the humble instrument of curing sufferers of the sundry ailments—and that, too, without physical contact, or any belief, culminated desire, or knowledge of the intent or of the process involved. Indeed, we have been made reasonably certain of instrumentality in various cures, when we nor the patient were conscious of the action, until the cure and interlinking facts gave testimony thereof. In such cases as we have felt "virtue go out" of us,—have been subjected to the pains, the symptoms, of the patient. We will give a few cases in point:

Seven years ago, we met in a social gathering a young lady, Miss Sarah Cornish, of Bainbridge, New York, who complained of a severe toothache, which had often afflicted her, and had kept her awake the preceding night. After a few minutes' conversation,—not upon the subject of her trouble—in a company of young people, we asked the lady in question, if her toothache was not better. She at once replied, "It is entirely free from pain!" We had not been nearer than ten feet to the patient; had not thought of curing the pain, until impressed that it had ceased, nor by word or thought indicated that we could or would do so; yet we feel confident that a magnetic current was established between us, because we felt "virtue go out," and because our guides informed us of the fact and process, which to us was a reasonable solution of the phenomenon.

At another time, we placed a hand on the face, over an ulcerated and aching tooth, of a niece, Miss Maria Smith (of same village), when, in ten or fifteen minutes, a blister, as large as a silver ten-cent piece, raised from her face under our hand. Was the blister the result of a somnambulic condition? We think that the action of magnetic, nerve-vitel force drew the disease or inflammation to the surface, and caused the blister.

On another occasion, we attended a Methodist quarterly meeting. Soon after being seated, a lady entered the church and was seated opposite to and facing us; these seats in an old-fashioned church ranged lengthwise of the building, facing the pulpit on either side. Our attention was strongly impelled toward her, and we noticed she was looking rather fixedly at us; a brother-in-law sat beside us, with whom she was well acquainted. A few days after, when the lady in question, she apologized for "staring at us," and related, that when she entered the church, she was suffering from a very severe headache; that she seemed impelled to look at us (we presume not on account of good looks) and that with a ten minutes' stare, the pain had entirely ceased, thus enabling her to enjoy the services of the meeting. She had no knowledge or belief upon the question of our healing gift—knew nothing of the principle. We knew nothing of her suffering. Will the somnambulic theory cover this case?

We could multiply incidents and phenomena in point, from our own experience and observation, as well as from an inexhaustable array in the experience of humanity, in all ages of the world; but time and the length of this paper forbids, nor is it essential to the purpose thereof. But we cannot refrain from reciting a passage in the letter of Mrs. M. P. Cunningham, published in No. 21, of Vol. IX of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, wherein she states, that while watching over a sick sister-in-law, "I felt a steady stream run up my left arm, down my back, to the foot, where it settled and rested on my ankle badly. I bore it as long as I could, until it took all the strength I had left, to stand up and bear the pain. Then I was obliged to lave and bathe my foot with warm camphor. I had on, at the time, thin shoes, with rubbers over; and, without thinking about it, until too late, I was insulated, and the diseased fluid could not pass off."

Now, Bro. F., was this "steady stream" of "diseased fluid" the somnambulic condition, creeping along the nerves of this lady? And does somnambulism cause pain and swelling? We think the lady has the right idea of the action, as she certainly had a painful sense of the effect; and the statement made by her clearly points to the fact of interchange of animal or nerve magnetism between the sick and the well—the positive and negative poles concentered in the "healer" and in the patient. This conclusion is strongly fortified by the swelling of the foot insulated by the rubber. This fact also strongly indicates the real nature, as well as action, of the force, element, or substance involved in "healing, and its varied phases of manifestation; that it is of the nature of electricity, and that its action is governed by analogous laws or conditions. We believe it to be electricity assimilated in the human organism, or that of the animal, vegetable, or mineral organism or substance, as the case may be.

This postulate admitted, a rational solution of the law involved in each phase of the phenomena in question, is easily attainable. The mystery of somnambulism will melt into naturalness, under its genial rays; for it will be found that sleep-walking is but a condition of trance. It will lead us to the solution of the law and its processes in all phases of the phenomena which the Doctor calls somnambulism. In these, as in healing, there are two poles: the positive operator or controlling mind, and the negative subject or receiving and reflecting mind. The organisms of either may be likened to the telegraphic instrument. Both are capable of transmitting and receiving,—if the positive or the negative sphere of condition and action. Both are endowed with generative or assimilative powers, and with emanating or distributive functions.

Each has a complete electrical or magnetic generator and fountain or reservoir, as also circuits and poles of transmission and intermission of exchange and interchange—of communication and intercommunication. Each may be used as the dispatching or recording instrument.

A clear knowledge of these powers, forces, and functions—of the modes of interchange—will enable us to use them for any purpose—high or low—within the range of human emotions and attributes. It will enable us to play upon any chord of another's being, which we may select, by the law of negative en rapport upon any sense or function of sensation. It will permit the positive mind to reflect its consciousness upon that of the negative mind—either through the sense of smell, taste, feeling, hearing, seeing, or intuition; and through this law, as we believe, are the so-called gifts of clairvoyance, clairvoyance, and clairvoidance or clear consciousness, culminated. And this function and power belongs alike to individualized mind of either realm or sphere of existence,—the so-called mundane or spiritual, with the individuals of which there is no difference, as to the power, in kind—only in degree.

By the theorem it is easy to solve the mystery of these mental phenomena, while that of Bro. Fahnestock—somnambulism—leaves us as much in the dark as to the modus operandi, as well as, often, to the source of emanating idea, as before his "explanation." This fact is well illustrated by his answer to the query of a former correspondent of the JOURNAL. That answer appeared in No. 20 of Vol. IX of that paper, under the caption: "A Singular Case—Explanation." In order that a clear understanding of the case—the Explanation and the position of Dr. F. thereon—be had by the reader, we here insert the entire statement:

BROTHER JOHNS:—In your paper of the 14th of January, 1871, I noticed a detailed account of a boy twelve years of age, who, while at school (at Fort Scott) saw, lying on the floor, a beautiful jewel in the centre of a rim of gold, etc., but upon attempting to pick it up, "found herself unable to do so or feel them after making several unsuccessful efforts to pick it up, she turned her head and eyes toward the window,—when the spell was broken—and upon looking for the jewel, it was gone."

To the questions which followed the description, viz:

"What does this mean? Who can tell?"

I answer—that the girl had accidentally fallen into a partial somnambulic state, and while being then clairvoyant, she saw the jewel, but her body, being also in the same condition, and not knowing the true nature of the state, was unable to move, until she broke up the conditions by turning her head and eyes to the window, which caused her to rise out of the state, consequently, being then in a normal condition, she could not see what she saw before.

The reason why she saw the impression or spirit of the jewel that once lay there, or only the result of her imagination, I will not say, as she, when in that condition, could have seen it either way.

It is a demonstrated fact that clairvoyants can see spiritual things, and what they imagine, as well as they can that which really exists.

The young girl must, therefore, have either seen the spiritual, or what she imagined, because there really was nothing there visible to eyes in a normal condition.

In conclusion, I will but remark that the young lady is naturally a somnambulist, or capable of entering the somnambulic condition, and if properly taught, would become clairvoyant, or even clear-minded and mediumistic at will.

If Dr. Newton's gift, and all our best mediums are natural and untested somnambulists, her talent should not be smothered or suffered to lie dormant.

Fraternally,
WM. B. FAHNESTOCK.

Our expounder seems to "break up" his theorem into small fragments. He says, "Her body being also in the same condition (that of somnambulism), and not knowing the nature of the state, was unable to move, until she broke up the conditions, by turning her head and eyes, etc. But, are not her head and eyes a part of the body? And if clairvoyant, would not her eyes necessarily be somnambulized, according to the Doctor's explanation? If so, how could she turn her "eyes to the window," if not able "to move" by reason of this wonderful state of somnambulism? But I suppose our brother will, like theologians, answer, "It is the mystery of somnambulism!" Ask him what is somnambulism,—what the source of nature,—and he only answers: It is somnambulism,—at least, so far as we have yet seen a definition of his theorem.

No wonder he is in doubt as to whether "what she saw was the impression or spirit of the jewel that once lay there, or only the result of her imagination." A jewel once having lain there, and having an individualized spirit,—which must necessarily be deduced from his statement of the case,—would it qualify the impressed eye or be fixed to the spot as a spirit entity? If the result of the girl's imagination, what need of somnambulism or clairvoyance, to behold the figure of her own mind?

We deny that it is possible for one to see—clairvoyantly or with the natural eye—that which is only imagined. One may perceive or intuitively cognize "creatures of the imagination;" but never, as with the natural or spiritual eye, SEE.

We infer that the Doctor is not, himself, clairvoyant; else he would not make so great a blunder as to say that "clairvoyants can see only what they imagine, as well as that which really exists." Nor can he have a clear understanding of the gift, power, or function—as you choose to term it. Possessing this beautiful gift, we think we have, at least, a knowledge of the effect, if not of the cause and mode. We testify that there is a clear and distinct difference between clairvoyant and natural sight, and also as between clairvoyance and the perceptions of the imagination, or rather the memory; for we believe that so-called imagination is only a vitalization of memory; that forms so perceived anew are only the memory (made active) of forms and colors, which have been seen with the natural or clairvoyant eye, or combinations of such forms and colors.

It seems to us that the true, hence natural and scientific solution of the phenomenon, in the case of the little girl at Fort Scott, is, that she was under the magnetic subjection of a disembodied mind, who transferred from the storehouse of his consciousness and memory the picture of the piece of jewelry described. This theorem harmonizes with the facts of clairvoyance—its law, as we understand it,—and is susceptible of rational explanation, under the rules of logic and the laws of nature. At a future time we may lay before the public the views we entertain thereon, together with illustrative facts and the reasons why we arrive at our conclusions.

We believe it to be an axiom of science, that, Whatever can be accounted for and solved by known principles, laws, and modes of nature, is not miracle; and when susceptible of solution by observing this axiom, it is unscientific and absurd to resort to theorems which are strained, and not susceptible of explanation and comprehension. The theorem that magnetism—animal or spiritual; rather human—mundane or supermundane; is the agent, and human mind the guiding entity of these varied mental phenomena, as also the healing phase is indicative of good instead of "evil," as our good brother assumes. No power or function vouchsafed to man by nature, but must, of necessity, be good; and none that is not susceptible of abuse.

But to make a direct answer to the question, "Did magnetism put this subject into this condition?" we would respond, that magnetism or nerve-vital fluid or force, was the agent; while mind was the evolving, guiding, and culminating CAUSE.

However, if wrong, we wish to be "set right." And we will thank and bless Bro. Fahnestock, or any other, who will lead us to the Evergreen Isles of Truth. Our motto is:

"Seize upon truth, where'er 'tis found—
Among your friends, among your foes;
On Christian or on heathen ground.
The flower is divine, wherever it grows;
Neglect the prickles and assume the rose."

TO THOSE WHOM IT MAY CONCERN.

By Wm. B. Fahnestock.

I would ask those who still blindly assert without demonstration, that there is such a thing as an animal magnetic fluid, and that they have power to throw persons into what they call a "magnetic condition"—whether they suppose that, because those who are ignorant of the facts, and have been taught to believe that a certain person, who calls himself a magnetizer, can make them do any thing that he may will or imagine; that, if those persons had been taught the truth, that they could not resist him. If they believe this, Dr. Sangrado, "in Gil Blas," would be a paragon to them, and I have but to say that no one who understands the powers of those who have been in a somnambulic condition, will ever be guilty of saying that they have a power over them, or can do any thing with them contrary to their will.

False impressions must yield to facts, although ages intervene—and no assertion, however supported by appearances, which are caused by false impressions inculcated, will ever counteract the truth. I, therefore, insist that the operator has no power to throw any one into the condition who understands the true nature of the state—but, to com; rehend the philosophy of why he can not,—it must be remembered that, the functions of the spirit and of the brain can act independent of each other, and therefore, that the perceptive can perceive independent of the functions of consciousness, and that when persons have once been in the somnambulic condition, that the functions of perception are almost always watching their surroundings, and naturally revert to the person who had them in charge before, although he may be a thousand miles away; and on distance making nothing to persons, when in that susceptible condition, even a thought of the person upon whom they may have directed their mind, can be known by them independent of their own consciousness. Thus, it often happens, that when subjects are not acquainted with the true nature of their condition or their powers while in that state, they will fall into the condition, not because the operator had the power to throw them into it, but, because the subject reads his mind unconsciously, and, making no resistance, fell into the condition. But when the subject has a knowledge of the true nature of the condition and his powers therein, it is impossible for any operator to throw him into the condition at any time, even when present and endeavoring to do so.

If operators really had the power, they ought to be able to throw them into the state under any circumstances, and if they can throw them into the state so easily, even, when, as they assert, "without the patients knowledge." Why can not they do so when the patient is taught the true nature of the condition? Let them answer this fact, which they can, at any time, prove to their own satisfaction, if they will honestly teach their own subjects the truth.

I have had any number of persons, whose knowledge of the condition was imperfect—to do all the absurdities that magnetizers of the present day are practicing and formulating; and could have persons of that stamp, to do them now, if I were so disposed—but when I found that all these apparent powers of the operator, and most of the doings of subjects were caused by false impressions, and that they could imagine, and see, feel, taste, and do what they imagined, as is now detailed in the various papers by the column, I sought the truth; and by experiment proved that the power was in the subject, and, that as their knowledge was qualified by facts, their powers increased at the expense of the operators; but, where there is no disposition to see, it is folly to argue the point.

Experiment alone, all prejudice aside, must develop the truth to every searching mind, with such I leave it,—satisfied myself, that where the will is properly exercised the truth is easily found.

THE LAWS OF SPIRIT COMMUNION.

By D. P. Kayner, M. D.

In our former article we endeavored to trace the connection of spirit with thought, and hinted at the relations of all things, acting one upon the other.

Spirit being infinite, eternal and all pervading, must necessarily be "unity in diversity."

Therefore, all things, all forms, organisms and beings, are but manifestations of pervading or inherent spirit forces, working in and outworking through them to develop form, and individualize spirit into special growth.

All growth, then, is a projection of spirit into individualized forms; hence all are related in their ultimates; all are parts of one grand universal whole—linked, joined, bound, each to the other, and to all others, by the common tie of the universal oneness of spirit.

All structures, growths and organisms are of a three fold character—body, soul and spirit. The body is visible to the outer or physical senses, as it is composed of the grosser physical elements. The spirit is the intelligent, thinking, life giving power that moulds and forms the individuality. The soul is the individualised magnetic element through which spirit acts intelligently upon gross matter, which, when organized into an immortal entity in man, becomes the interior life of the physical, and then withdrawn therefrom, the outer covering of the spirit; or, in other words, the spirit body of the free immortal.

We have thus, in tracing from cause to effect, and from effect to cause, discovered the intermediate link of connection between the parts through which the law of relation, or interchange of influences, acts. That link exists in the magnetic "soul of things"; and spirit, as we have seen, being unity in diversity, can telegraph its thoughts or impress itself individually upon another individual whose states correspond to the influence of the impression.

This impression may be either conscious or unconscious—for spirit may act, and the outer senses not recognize the action. Another spirit can also control the organism of an individual, and that individual's spirit be held in abeyance and be kept oblivious of the fact.

Psychologically, one mind or spirit, by reversing the action or polarity of the magnets in another mind through which it controls its own organism, can control that body and fill the mind with the most absurd vagaries it is possible to imagine, and yet that mind under control may be made oblivious of the fact.

The spirit also may, in certain organisms and under proper circumstances, travel out of its own body, carrying with it enough of the physical elements thereof to make its presence realized and seen at a distance from its body, and do certain acts the same as though it was there in the body. Thus, also, many spirits, when departing this life, not having fully freed themselves of the physical elements that still cling to their magnetic envelopes, are able to appear to those friends at a distance whose minds are at that moment en rapport with them, and impart to them the particulars of their departure.

Well authenticated cases of this kind are recorded in Robert Dale Owen's "Footfalls Upon the Boundaries of Another World." It may also occur in certain clairvoyant states, or in that deep spiritual trance where the body for the time seems so dead.

We propose here to give a few well-authenticated facts as illustrations of the foregoing propositions, and in corroboration of the truths stated.

During the year 1845, a circle was held at the house of Mr. Yeaw, in Northern Massachusetts, when his son Jesse was controlled by a spirit purporting to be his brother Daniel, then at Morris Island, and announced that he had been shot and killed, very minutely stating particulars of the event, and persisted to affirm the entire truthfulness of his statements. Not long after this, Daniel returned home alive and well, and a circle was held at the house of Mr. Yeaw, in which Daniel was present in his body, and he related a dream in which he had been shot, and being desirous to see his friends when he left his body, he went home, and finding a circle organized in the house, he controlled his brother, and communicated the account of the affair precisely as they received it. The dream on Morris Island and the scene at the home in Massachusetts, were simultaneous occurrences.

Another case is recorded by E. W. Wheeler, in the American Spiritualist, which he has just received from Mrs. M. L. Clinton Barclay, the wife of E. F. Barclay, of the publishing house of Barclay & Co., 21 Arch street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Mrs. Barclay and Miss Beckwith were both mediums and warm personal friends.

One morning a gentleman called on Mrs. Barclay for a sitting, and on becoming entranced, the control claimed to be Mattie Beckwith.

"But you can not be dead," said the gentleman, who was also acquainted with her. "How is it that you control, and where is your body?"

"No; I am not dead," said the spirit. "I can not tell how I control, but my body is now asleep at my own place. I have come here and am led to communicate, as you see."

Making inquiry at the house of Miss Beckwith, the gentleman ascertained that at the time he was in consultation with Mrs. Barclay, Miss Beckwith, while engaged in writing letters, had dropped her head upon the table and fallen into a deep sleep or trance, and in this condition her spirit had assumed control of another body, and dictated through it a communication to a third party, and announced herself as the author, and the fact that her own body was asleep at home.

The following is clipped from the BANNER OF LIGHT:

"The late Rev. Joseph Wilkins, dissenting minister at Weymouth, England, dreamed in the early part of his life, a dream which he, which is carefully preserved in writing as follows:

One night, soon after I was in bed, of full asleep, and dreamed I was going to London. I thought it would be much out of my way to go through Gloucestershire, and call upon my brother Isaac. Accordingly I set out; but remembered nothing that happened by the way, till I came to my father's house, when I went to the front door, and tried to open it, but found it fast. I then went to the back door, which I opened, and went in; but finding all the family were in bed, I went across the rooms only, went up stairs, and entered the chamber where my father and mother were in bed. As I approached the side of the bed on which my father lay, I found him asleep, or thought he was so; then I went to the other side, and having just turned the foot of the bed, I saw my mother awake; to whom I said these words:

'Mother, I am going a long journey, and am come to wish you good-by.'

Upon which, she answered me in a fright:

'Oh, dear son, thou art dead!'

With this I awoke, and took no notice of it, more than a common dream; except that it appeared to me very perfect.

In a few days after, as soon as a letter could reach me, I received one by post from my father, upon the receipt of which I was a little surprised, and concluded something extraordinary must have happened, as it was a long time before I had a letter from my friends, and all were well. Upon opening it, I was more surprised still, for my father addressed me as though I were dead, desiring me, if alive, or that person in the world I was, that might fall, to write immediately; but if the letter should find me living, they concluded I should not live long, and gave this as the reason of their fear, that on a certain night (naming it) after they were in bed, my father and mother both awake, she heard some one trying to open the front door, but finding it fast, he appeared to go to the back door, which he opened, then entered, and came directly through the rooms up stairs, and she perfectly knew it to be my step; that I came to her bed side, and spoke to her these words:

'Mother, I am going a long journey, and am come to wish you good-by.'

Upon which she answered me in a fright:

'Oh, dear son, thou art dead!' which were the very circumstances and words of my dream; but she heard nothing more, and saw nothing. Neither did I in my dream. Upon my awaking, and told my father what had passed; but he endeavored to appease her, persuading her that it was only a dream; she insisted it was no dream, for that she was as perfectly awake as ever she was, and had not been in a disposition to sleep since she had been in bed. From these circumstances, I am apt to think it was at the very same instant when my dream happened, though the distance between me was about one hundred miles. This occurred while I was at the academy at Ottery, Devon, in the year 1754, and at this moment, every circumstance is fresh in my mind. I have since had frequent opportunities of talking over the affair with my mother, and the whole was as fresh in her mind as it was in mine. I have often thought that her sensations as to this matter were stronger than mine. Yet I do not remember anything remarkable happening hereupon. This is only a plain simple narrative of a matter-of fact.

Mr. Wilkins died November 15th, 1800, in the 70th year of his age.

FOUR QUESTIONS.

Who Will Answer?

1st. Why is it that we never hear a preacher of "orthodoxy," whose salary is less than six thousand a year, speak of Thomas Paine, without lying about him?

2nd. Why is it that we never hear one of those preachers who abuse "Tom Paine," quote his writings and arguments against Christianity, and, in presence of their "dear hearers," answer them?

3d. Why is it, that when preachers repeat in the pulpit, Paine's arguments in proof of the "immortality of the soul,"—they never give him credit for the source, but, instead, palm them off as their own? Of this they are frequently guilty, as every reader of Paine knows.

4th and last. Why is it, that the editor of the Chicago Tribune never speaks of any man or woman, who differs with him in politics or religion, without misrepresenting such man or woman to the utmost of his ability?

There is not an "infidel" or Spiritualist in the country, who can not answer these questions—but any person is "good standing" in an "orthodox" church, who will answer these questions truthfully, through the JOURNAL, shall receive any weekly paper or journal published in the United States, one year, at my expense. A standing offer.

A FORMER.

MOINGONA, Iowa, March 10th, 1871.

Voices from the People.

MEDFORD, MINN.—Mrs. L. Hasen writes.—The "Search after God" is a magnificent work, so far, and when completed, is destined to do a great and good work. It will be a powerful "eye opener" to thousands now blind in the belief of some personal God. But why, in the name of truth, Brother Jones, do Spiritualists, who know better, still persist in speaking of the pervading essence of perfected nature, as "God," "He," "His," etc., as of an individual? If the spirit is omnipotent and omnipresent, as philosophy teaches, why not call things by their right names? The world has ever been, and to a great extent is now, deceived by false teachings, delusions, and false terms, as well as false attributes, as applied to the great pervading force of the universe. There is not an orthodox church in the land but holds to the idea of an individual supreme being, or God, and, it seems to me, that this is one of the first errors to be overcome, and that the sooner people's minds are disabused of the individual God theory, the sooner will they be prepared to see things in their right light. Brother Francis' "Search" is going to do an immense amount of good; but let all our Spiritualist lecturers and friends speak of our Father and Mother Nature, in a way to eradicate the old and erroneous idea of a personal God, and thereby be co-workers with Brother Francis. It is gratifying to read the comments on the "Search," for it indicates that minds are eagerly grasping for light; and judging by the voracious taste of some of them should think its influence had certainly been happy. My papers are constantly circulating among those whom I can prevail upon to read them. May the good work go on until the whole world is saved. I hope no one who reads the JOURNAL will fail to read lecture number twenty three, on the "Last Judgment," by Emma Hardinge. It is grand—indeed everything in your columns is acceptable. We have just been enjoying a visit from our good sister, Harriet E. Pope. She came to visit, and obtain some rest. She is doing all she can in the field, but no one knows as well the completeness of her life, and her invaluable worth, as the constant friend with whom she lives. If every one's life were as perfect as Sister Pope's, the world would have to seek a new field of labor.

MARTINSBURG, MO.—A. Jennie Higgins writes. Tell Mr. Francis I found God long ago, the same time he found me. His search after him, however, cost me any of your Chicago detectives, and I have no doubt from the agitation his articles have created, that it will result in much good, and serve to enlighten many a groping mind. I like his style. He is a fearless writer. Mr. Francis have a wide margin. You can afford to.

OLIVET, MICH.—Charles McBradner writes.—Your "Search after God" is a good thing. It will set a great many to thinking. Can not say that I endorse the whole of it. I will wait until you find him.

MICHIGAN CITY, IND.—W. B. Gustine writes. I am admonished that with the last JOURNAL, my year expires. Please find inclosed three dollars, to renew my subscription for another year. In all my investments in reading matter, I find that the JOURNAL gives me the best returns for the money expended, and find that I can hardly pay just when my subscription expires, from the fact that I make my calculations accordingly. I am glad to see that you have been bold enough to make a start in a "Search after God," who has been lost to humanity ever since we have had a history. Persevere, brother. Seek and ye shall find; knock, and the door of knowledge shall be opened to you. Your "Search after God" will lead thousands of minds that are struggling to give birth to those thoughts you are sending forth every week.

RICHLAND, WIS.—Levi Wood writes.—I am glad to know that the JOURNAL is doing good, from the fact that it is out spoken, fearless to speak the truth, without fear of the popular will. Your "Search after God" has been to me a subject of profound interest. It has presented to my mind some beautiful and grand ideas.

VERMILLION, ILL.—Mrs. Jackson writes.—The "Search after God" is splendid. I hope the author will have it published in book form. I would like to send or hand it to some of my Universalist friends whose mental stomachs can't relish such food after having been fed on husks so many years.

TUNNEL CITY, WIS.—L. W. Morse writes.—I am very much interested in the "Search after God." An old orthodox Methodist told me day before yesterday that he saw God thirty three years ago in the state of New York in the atmosphere. I asked him how he looked. He said he looked like a large man, with a long face, and striped with all colors. He supposed the colored stripes to represent the different nations of the earth. If Brother Francis is not likely to find him very soon, I would advise him to make a search in the northern part of New York. Perhaps he may yet be located there; if not found there, I don't know where he can be found.

AUBURN, N. Y.—E. B. Prest writes.—I will not encroach on your time only to reiterate, with Luna Hutchinson, that there is a sanctuary in every heart and brain where naught but a God may dwell, and from its sacred altar, prayer goes out to the infinite source of life as freely as rivers flow onward to the sea, or flowers expand before the morning sun. Friend Francis, continue to search out God, and if you get him just right, you will suit us all.

ROSSVILLE, IOWA.—M. H. Baldwin writes.—I distribute my paper to a good many. Several are inquiring if you are going to print the "Search after God" in book form. Every one who reads it seems to have their ideas started on the double quick for more.

BUFFALO, N. Y.—Lester Day writes.—Go on, Brother, in your good work, and when you find God, may he bless you for the good you are doing in the cause of humanity by your fearless defense of the right, and open condemnation of all wrong. If all professed Spiritualists would live the principles that your paper advocates, we should not see the suffering that we are daily compelled to witness.

LODI, OHIO.—Miss A. Merrifield writes.—Enclosed please find two dollars, for which, please send me your priceless JOURNAL. I send this early, to prevent missing any of the valuable reading it may contain. I fervently hope that the expiration of this subscription I will be able to extend it again, for I feel that life would indeed be lonely without it,—situated as I am, feeble in health, "a good many years beyond sixty," without a permanent home. I can not say how long my limited means will permit my sending. My paper is read by many in this vicinity, and they will all agree with me in saying that the "Search after God" is grand, and as our mind follows through all the wanderings, sometimes through difficult and mysterious places, sometimes in the broad sunlight of our own reason, we find that the moment the attempt is made to see God—that moment we lose sight of him entirely; therefore I think a careful reasoing of it will do away with the hitherto popular idea of a personal deity.

KINGSVILLE, MO.—W. J. Atkinson, M. D., writes.—In one number of the JOURNAL, some time ago, there appeared, if I am not mistaken, an editorial with this caption, "Old as Infinite God, or Beings Like Man Create this Earth?" in which the idea seemed to be that an infinite God had nothing to do in it, but that it was formed by the control of a band of spirits, like men, and in time, we would become creators. Now, if that position is true, who was the first creator that created man? If I understand the position of things, matter and spirit were not created, but are infinite, without beginning of days, or end of time, and in this way "life diffused," and "mind diffused," the condensation of which caused to exist a living, organized intelligence, as mad, or less intelligent, as the lower animals. Now after this—this spirit—takes control of the creative power and creates worlds and systems of worlds, but I wish to know what power it is that first causes the concentration of matter and spirit, and life diffused and mind

WISCONSIN DOCTOR BILL.

How It was Amended and Disposed of in The Legislature—A New Test Medium.

Wisconsin is all right on the medical record. All restrictive laws have been wiped out. All doctors, healers, magnetizers, with diplomas and without, must hereafter stand on the same footing.

Last winter a law was passed in the Wisconsin Assembly, making the practice of medicine without a diploma punishable by fine and imprisonment. It came out with a big sounding head, "To protect the people from empiricism and imposition in the practice of medicine." The bill was carried in the Assembly by four majority, after the united and powerful championship of all the "M. D's" in the Legislature. The bill was amended in the Senate, to the great grief of the diploma ring, so as to except all who had been in continuous practice in the state for five years. The bill passed as amended, and went into operation last July.

The five year's exception let in most doctors practicing in the country, and about "shoeskins," but cut off all the outside rabble of clairvoyants and magnetic doctors.

The bill, among liberal minds, was looked upon as a disgrace and insult to the good sense of the state. At the State Spiritual Convention, held at Sparta last summer, A. A. Wheelock, J. O. Barrett, S. U. Hamilton, Mr. & H. Todd and others, charged loudly and lastly on the whole afternoon against the bigotry and enormity of this sort of class legislation, but that effort did not outlast the echo of their words. There were then some twenty or more magnetic healers or doctors in the state, but not within the necessary five years' practice. All were under bad, and liable to indictment or imprisonment, if they threw out a card for practice in any form. Even our great magnetizer, Dr. W. W. Herring, of Milwaukee, who was doing more good to the afflicted than any M. D. in the city, was forced to take down all signs of being a "medicine man" from his dwelling, and banish all cards and circulars as if they were charged with malignience. When he was sent for to relieve the afflicted elsewhere in the state, he could only skulk about in violation of law.

The state capital, at the state capital, the M. D's, by general consent, came in with a tightener to the old bill,—cutting off all the five years' practitioners till they had first been examined by, and got a proper "diploma" from, the censor of some medical society. The bill received the full endorsement of the medical committee, and was rolling on lovely, as the doctors supposed, to its final reading in the Assembly, when Mr. Maxon, the distinguished free trade leader, rose to his seat, and told the doctors he would vote for their bill after he had sent up a little amendment to perfect it. The amendment was read by the clerk:

"Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert as follows,—"being an entire repeal of all medical restrictions passed last winter."

Mr. Maxon supported his amendment in a few brave words, showing the wrong and injustice of all such restrictive class legislation. The doctors were nonplussed, and the bill passed as amended, by more than four to one.

The next move was to kill the "repeal" in the Senate. The doctors had their pins all set, and supposed the old law was safe,—but the pins didn't stick. When the final vote was ordered, two weeks ago, not a vote or a voice was raised against the repeal bill.

Of course friends here and elsewhere, rejoice at this quiet, summary disposal of Doctor legislation in Wisconsin. Our old magnetic friend, Dr. Herring, had decided to leave this state for more hospitable shores, but has cancelled his order, as he is much needed. He is now having a big sign painted, emblazoning his business in large sized capitals.

In conclusion, let me mention a young lady medium now stopping in the city, at the residence of that staunch old Spiritualist, Mr. J. W. Parker. Her name is Cinthia Charlesworth. She is from Omro, near Oshkosh, and has, till recently, been a normal school student, and country school-mam. She is unknown to the public, and has given no sittings for pay. She is clairvoyant and sympathetic, and peculiarly susceptible of childr n's control. I have met her on two occasions, and received the fullest and most wonderful tests from my "little girl lost," that I ever heard or read of, from any source.

HEALING MEDIUMS.

By W. J. Atkinson, M. D.

Sitting yesterday evening for development, I was impressed with the following thoughts, concerning the knotty question of "Animal Magnetism,"—that such phases of mediumship as that of our sister, Mrs. A. H. Robinson, certainly proved the existence of such a fluid as the magnetic, and that it was perfectly in accordance with natural law, for the medium to be for the time being, affected with the same disease as the patient. To illustrate:

A person being put en rapport with one who is under the influence of an electro-galvanic battery, will receive and feel the shock as sensibly as the first person. So the lock of hair or other article of the patient, acts as a conductor or chain, by the means of which, the medium is brought en rapport with the sick person, and, therefore, will feel the effects of the disease as forcibly as the sick person. This view of the subject looks as reasonable for the one as for the other.

Bro. Fahnestock denies the existence of the "magnetic fluid, because it has not been "tasted, handled or bottled," like some other things in nature. Really I can not feel the force of the argument, for certainly the air is a fluid that has not been tasted, handled nor bottled, yet it certainly exists. We can not see its power and feel its influence. So with magnetism,—we can see the effect it has upon a subject, and feel its influence, and Bro. Underhill says that the clairvoyant can see it. Every organized body has an aura or emanation going off from itself, that constitutes its sphere. If we are brought in contact with that emanation, we feel the influence of the body that sends off said emanation. If an individual comes into our presence, we feel his influence through the aura of his body,—it is by this aura, that diseases are communicated from one to another. This aura or emanation is what I term animal magnetism, and I believe that Bro. Fahnestock, in one of his articles to Bro. Underhill, admitted the existence of the aura. This aura certainly carries with it the feelings of the body from which it came, to a certain extent. Who has not been placed in the company of an individual who had a selfish, beastly nature most prominent, and caused to feel most miserable, from absorbing a portion of that selfish magnetism? It seems to me that if we deny the existence of said fluid, we deny the means by which the bereaved may be made glad—the means of spirit communion. There must be a real telegraphic chain of some sort between us and the Spirit World, by which spirits can send their thoughts to us, and if it is not this chain of animal magnetism, or its counterpart spiritual magnetism, I can not see how it can be accomplished.

I regard Bro. Fahnestock as an earnest worker in a good cause, but, nevertheless, I do not regard him as infallible in this thing—which, however, he does not claim. I am anxious to see this subject thoroughly dissected, and demonstrated by the best investigators.

Clarksburg, Mo., May 29, 1871.

to believe the "plan of salvation and damnation" presented to my infant mind, and thus believing, I envied the natural status of the heathen child who had never learned, and perhaps might never learn, the dreadful leaven which caused me—a little child—to cower beneath the angry frown of an offended God.

RESCUE THE CHILDREN.

The band of love! the angel band!
Shall sponsors for our children stand,
And train them in the paths of love,
To commune with their friends above:
So pious, canting priest shall rule
The children of our higher school,
But in sweet Nature's native grace
They yet shall move and take their place
As students of progression's laws,
Devoted to the heavenly cause!

"A Story of Life in its True Features."

REBECCA; A WOMAN'S SECRET.

BY MRS. CAROLINE FAIRFIELD CORBIN;

Author of "Uncle Timothy; or, Our Bible Class."

12mo. 443 pages.

Real Life unfolded in a story of great beauty and power. Society sifted—the good and bad shown in fearful contrast; woman as she is, and for what she was designed; man as he is, and for what he was designed. Society, or men and women made for each other; "not in families," after the Divine order.

A pure and noble inspiration breathes from every page of the book, and its moral tone is all that the most fastidious critic can desire.

MEDIUMS' DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory, giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as solved upon the subject. This will afford better facilities for investigators in search of the locations of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time, that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a lamentable fact that some mediums so far forget their self respect as to speak evilly of other mediums, not unfrequently even of those who are far their superiors. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Register, so soon as we have evidence conclusive of their indulging in such unbecoming.

It should be borne in mind that individuals visiting mediums carry conditions with them either—to speak—which add or destroy the powers of spirits to control the medium visited; hence it is that one medium gives satisfaction to certain persons, another better to others—all having their friends and justly so, true and all equally honest and entitled to their place.

PARLOR ALBUM

IN FIVE QUARTO VOLUMES.

Price, $9.00 per volume, or $40.00 per set complete.

Description of the Work:

THE PARLOR ALBUM is doubtless the most extensive ART GALLERY ever published, and, by those who have examined the several portions of the work, it has been pronounced, "The Climax of Beauty." Each volume contains 20 full page Chromo Lithographs, in Oil Colors, 40 full page Steel Engravings, 40 full page Engravings on Wood, and 320 pages of reading matter, descriptive of the illustrations, the whole making each volume about one-half as thick, and same fixed pages, as Webster's largest Dictionary. Each volume is complete in itself, and will be sold separately, if desired. Sold by Subscription Only.

Vol. I Is devoted to Still American Birds.
Vol. II Contains Wild American Animals.
Vol. III, American Domesticated Birds and Animals.
Vol. IV, Foreign Birds and Animals.
Vol. V, Fishes, Reptiles, and Insects.

This work will at once commend itself to the cultivated American people, and no library will, hereafter, be complete without this addition to its treasures; while as a parlor amusement it is unequalled by American publications.

Agents Wanted.

☞ We will give agents very liberal terms for selling the above described publications, and wish to appoint an agent in every town in the United States and British Provinces. Experienced book agents, and all other persons of respectability should apply at once. A young man or young lady can, by devoting a short time during the day or evening, secure a complete set, free of expense, or, if preferred, we will allow a large Commission to Agents.

We have prepared a most beautiful SPECIMEN BOOK FOR AGENTS, containing Five of the Oil Chromos, Ten Steel Engravings, Ten Wood Engravings, and 50 pages of descriptive reading, being selected from each volume, together with blank pages, specimen of binding, etc., etc.

Our Specimen Book has cost us quite largely, and we do not wish to send it to persons who do not intend to act as agents, but to any one who will make an effort to procure subscribers to the Work, we will send the Specimen Book, prepaid, on receipt of 40 cents to cover postage. TERMS OF THE

Religio-Philosophical Journal.

$3,00 per year, $1,50—6 months, $1,—4mo.

☞ Fifty Cents for Three Months on trial. TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or Post-Office Money Order, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to fifteen cents, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3,50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names ENTERED on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office

OR NOT.

Courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing them, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to Dec. 18th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith J.—18 Dec.—0." The 0 means 1870. If he has only paid to Dec. 18th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—18 Dec.—0, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as '70 for 1870, or '69 for 1869.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL, should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

Peculiar Manifestations—Schools in the Spheres—A Beautiful Law—The Books of Earth Reproduced in the Spirit World, and How—Newspapers Here Republished There—The Congressional Globe—Spiritual Congress—No Book that Emanates from God—The Third Book between all Antagonistic Books—Spirit Photography—A Grand Work about to be Inaugurated.

Just emerged from the scenes of earth, divested of gross materiality, and invigorated with the animating influences of the Spirit World, this eminent personage began to realize his own insignificance, and to comprehend the fact that he could not be ushered into the presence of God. On all sides, everything was eminently well calculated to inspire him with reverential awe, and induce within him the spirit of investigation. Palatial residences with beautiful environments of grove and water scenery, greeted him on all sides. A murmuring spring here, a silvery lake yonder, while off in the distance was a river meandering among the hills and valleys,—all presenting to his enraptured vision a scene that filled his soul with emotions of delight. On all sides, the realities presented to him were new, and he could hardly believe that individualized intelligences were endowed with sufficient skill to execute them. How difficult it was for him to banish preconceived opinions, and appreciate the fact, that connected with all the beautiful scenes that greeted him, were individualized intelligences. Nowhere was the throne of God. On all sides, busy hands were at work. Skillful mechanics, chemists, engineers, mathematicians, etc.,—all found ample room to manifest their skill. The idea of the existence of a God seemed to be so deeply imbedded within his sensitive nature, that he was continually looking for his footprints in the beautiful works that constantly greeted his vision. Again his instructor approaches him.

Spirit—Tell me, pray, what engages your attention to-day?

Lucretus—The scenes in the Spirit World are so varied, and so different from those of earth, that I find much food for thought. I find constant activity here. No hands are idle. On all sides, I see industry manifested. How happy each one seems to be.

Spirit—Constant activity is required. He who comes here and remains idle, will be left behind by those whose industry never fails in being rewarded.

Lucretus—I find here mathematical instruments, telescopes,—in fact many things I found on earth, only much more perfect.

Spirit—The spiritual telescope is used to discern spiritual things, the same as the telescopes of earth are used to unfold the material works of space. There are worlds that no spirit from earth has ever visited; worlds that do not belong to our solar system. Spirits can not always travel where they wish. The movements of the spiritual organization is confined within the action of law. The denizens of earth only use their telescope to unfold the nature of those worlds that they can not visit. Those of this and other spheres only use it for the same purpose.

Lucretus—Tell me, pray, can spirits visit the different planets?

Spirit—Certainly. The worlds of each system are connected with each other by lines of communication, but each grand system, only communicate with others from the highest planes of each. You can not visit other systems of worlds at present, nor until you have attained the highest sphere here. Each sphere has its arts and sciences, which are in more perfect condition in the one higher. The telescope of one sphere can not unfold the grandeur of the heavens as beautifully as the one in the sphere above. Each sphere imparts its lessons of wisdom. I could not explain to the denizens of earth, the scenes that are everywhere presented to my vision, in language that they could understand.

Lucretus—Is not God in the highest sphere of existence?

Spirit—We know of no highest sphere of existence. Progression will never cease. The spheres in the Spirit World are beautifully interblended, and the first is the SHADOW, as it were, of the second, the second of the third, and so on. In the various spheres, we find the same diversity of pursuits as on earth.

Lucretus—But you say that there is only one communication or route of travel between different solar systems.

Spirit—True; and that from the very highest plane of each one. The children of earth are confined to it, and for obvious reasons. Those of each sphere must remain there until they are prepared to advance in the scale of existence. Those in the lower spheres can not visit distant worlds, until they thoroughly understand everything that demands their attention there. Where there is a natural demand, there is a supply. There is no natural necessity in idle curiosity, hence, those in the lower spheres are confined to those planes, until they progress from them. In the highest spiritual spheres of each planet, communications are established with others, and thereon spirit can travel, surveying the wonders of the universe. There is a beautiful interblending of all the spheres.

Lucretus—Pray tell me how they pass from one sphere to another?

Spirit—On earth, through the instrumentality of death, the spirit is liberated, and naturally gravitates to that sphere in the Spirit World that it is adapted to occupy. In each successive change, the spirit leaves behind its outer body or covering, for death on earth does not completely divest the spirit of its grossness. Each change to a higher sphere in the Spirit World, only renders the spirit more pure and better adapted to proceed on its course in the endless scale of existence. God, an Infinite God, has nothing to do with these various changes.

Lucretus—This Heaven; where is the opposite—Hell? It is said that God made both of these places.

Spirit—Oh, how inexhaustible your inquiries! A Hell! Base ignorance still exists on earth, and it has fastened its fangs deeply into the human mind. To some, the belief in a Hell has exercised a restraining influence, and prevented many dark and damning deeds. There are conditions of life here that would cause the tear of sympathy to glisten in your eyes, but there is no fire and brimstone connected therewith. The murderer, he whose soul only aspires to wrong some one, gravitates only to the lower sphere on his entrance to the Spirit World, and the suffering he endures there for a while, is wholly of a psychological character. Thus, his wrong deeds, the victims he had injured, and those whom he had ruined, would become to him living realities, until certain conditions were induced that would awaken higher aspirations. This is a natural result. Wrong deeds leave their effects upon the mind.

Lucretus—Then the Hell only exists within the mind?

Spirit—True. Every act of life, whether good or bad, leaves its effect upon the mind, and it is that which, to some extent, constitutes Heaven or Hell. Now I desire here to say, that the mind is a store-house of effects. He who murders, imparts an effect to the mind. That effect may lie dormant for years, but it can only pass away through its own action. The effect obliterates itself. Its action causes its own destruction, and in so doing, produces a great deal of suffering. Allow me to add, that effects always partake of the nature of that from which they originate, and connected therewith is an image. The murderer has within his mind as effect of his act, the image of the murdered man, and though in earth-life it may not rise up to confront him, it will do so in spirit-life.

Lucretus—But does not God finally judge such?

Spirit—The effects of the mind only sit in judgment. The effects thereof are the witnesses that confront you—they are the judge and jury. There is no God who sits in judgment. I desire to be explicit. Now, listen attentively. Each act always leaves an effect upon the mind. Their image is indelibly impressed there. Under certain conditions, those images become living realities, tangible images, as it were, and are as real to the mind as any object in existence. Supposing a beautiful painting is before you. The image is first imprinted on the retina of the eye, then on the mind, where the effects thereof will remain. Take the painting away, and still the indistinct outlines of it are in the mind. This you know to be a fact. Now, under certain conditions of the mind, these indistinct outlines become illuminated, and the very painting seems presented to you. Some mediums on earth, highly impressible, can be made to see their own spirit friends, or those they knew on earth, for the outlines thereof are within their own mind, and spirits understand the law by which those dim outlines can be illuminated. Such mediums think that this is all hallucination on their part, as they only see those spirits that they were well acquainted with on earth. Now, when the murderer dies, all these indistinct outlines, or life pictures of his mind can be illuminated by spirits, in order to show him his real condition. The law by which this is done is grand indeed, and soon you will fully understand it.

Lucretus—Ah, I see a strange child before me in tattered garments. Oh! it is that little orphan. It is one I had in my own family circle—oh, what shall I do?

Spirit—Be tranquil. It is well she is there. I saw the dim outlines within your own mind, and I illuminated them. This lesson you must learn. This child you took when young. You and your family imposed upon her tasks beyond her powers of endurance. She ate, as it were, the crumbs from your table, wore your own children's cast-off garments, and her keen, sensitive nature was murdered a dozen times each day. When sickness came upon her, you thought that she was only feigning it, and put off getting a physician until too late; am I not correct?

Lucretus—Yes.

Spirit—The outlines of her life, her treatment, her death, are all within your mind, and I illuminated them, that you might see the suffering you caused in others. Teach the mortals of earth this grand principle,—impress it upon their minds, and great good will be accomplished thereby. Yes, struggling mortals of earth, you whom I would teach important lessons, ever bear in mind that the judgment book is within your own mind, and therein are the witnesses that will condemn you. In the Spirit World, these outlines will be illuminated, and the acts of your earth-life will pass before you like a panorama, and you will then know yourself. No God will judge you; no Devil will confront you; no one will conspire against you.

Lucretus—Please illuminate no more outlines of my mind. There! oh, there is a tenant whom I drove away when sick, because he could not pay his rent. Please let this pass from me!

Spirit—I am not God judging you. No God will ever judge you. These acts of your life are now sitting in judgment. Why should puny man fear to let his own acts sit in judgment? Pray, mortals of earth, to an infinite God, but he will not answer your prayers or favor you. Your own acts of life come as witnesses to the Spirit World. Behold the man you injured! When pinched with hunger, suffering from cold, and family poorly clad, you turned him into the streets! The children came to you on bended knee; the wife, with tears in her eyes entreated you not to turn them forth into the streets; but their tears and entreaties availed nothing. Go they must. The father passed away, and two of his children died from starvation. I saw the outlines of these events within your mind, and now is the proper time to illuminate them.

Lucretus—Please do so no more. I am now suffering the torments of ten thousand hells! Oh, why was I born, only to result in such misery! Annihilate me!—I am not worthy of an existence.

Spirit—The witnesses are not all examined yet. Your life in many respects has been grand and noble. You were a philanthropist on a large scale, but in some instances, a miserable, selfish man. You will only suffer that which you caused in others. You were the cause, and the effect thereof was transmitted to you. I will illuminate another outline in your mind

Lucretus—Forgive me, oh, God, for my many missteps! Kind angels take pity on me! Do not present these piercing daggers to me; they penetrate my very soul and create pains that I cannot endure. Would that I could be annihilated—pass into a state of forgetfulness! These scenes are terrible!

Spirit—No infinite God is judging you. Within your own mind are the witnesses, and they become to you living realities, and in language too plain to be misunderstood, tell you of your past life.

Lucretus—Oh, take away that scene!—that man whom I cruelly expelled from a small tenement house,—his countenance is lit up with dispair, and the cries of his poor children, and the entreaties of his wife, fill my soul with anguish.—Oh, blot out the scene! Truly, does each one bring his own witnesses to accuse him?

Spirit—True. The effects of every act are within the mind; illuminate them, and your accuser will stand before you.

Lucretus—I have aimed to do well—to live a life characterized by good deeds. Oh, how I failed! Tell me, pray, will these images pass away eventually?

Spirit—Certainly. This is one of the grandest laws in existence. You who steal, murder, commit any mean or selfish act, at that moment you lodge within your own mind an accuser, and at some future period it will rise up to confront you. No God will summon you to appear before him, and with a frown on his countenance consign you to endless perdition. Within your own mind are the accusers. Now, as I illuminate these outlines of your your mind, the scenes as they transpired are presented to you. Occasionally, however, they become spontaneously illuminated, and that, too, while one is a resident of the earth sphere. A man of a highly impressible nature, under the impulse of the moment commits murder. The scene so effects him that the murdered man, seemingly, is constantly standing before him, and he is regarded as insane. His insanity, if it can be so called, consists in the outlines of the scene of the murder becoming spontaneously illuminated, and all to him is a reality. To illustrate still further: Go into a dark room with a candle. You see there a beautiful work of art—an image of some noted character. An outline thereof is within the mind, but when the light is extinguished, you cannot see it. Now, under certain conditions, the outlines of objects within the mind become spontaneously illuminated, and you think you see the thing itself. In the first place, in order to see the image referred to, it and a light are necessary; now you see it through the instrumentality of the outlines within the mind becoming spontaneously illuminated.

Lucretus—Then, no infinite God, no judgment,—only the witnesses within you.

Spirit—No; I say, emphatically, No! Every act brings its own reward or punishment. To the toiling millions of earth I would say, that you carry along with you the witnesses that will appear against you in the future. Within each mind is a witness-box. Do you think you can escape the wrong you have done? Puny mortals,—lingering on the threshold of earth for a little season, I would exhort you to lead lives characterized by noble deeds. Lift some one up that is struggling with adverse tides. Sow seeds of benevolence. Speak a kind and encouraging word to all. Labor that others may be blessed. Give from thine ample stores, and an army of witnesses shall appear in thy behalf that you will be glad to greet. Yes, children of earth, on the tidal waves of the lowest spheres, remember that however dark the corner, however obscure the place where a damnable deed may be committed, the accuser will follow you, and some day will rise before you, to confront you. O how I wish I could instil within the minds of earth's children a correct appreciation of man's destiny. It is not to worship a God. In the boundless regions of space, where the footsteps of man never ventured, there he shall go, and as he sees rising up before him the works of his creative skill, he will exult that his mission is to build worlds, and do that which has been heretofore ascribed to God.

A Seance at the Residence of Mrs. A. H. Robinson—Spirits Arrange the Supper Table for the Entertainment of those present.

A festival—have you ever been at one? It is even declared in the Bible, that God, in his great wisdom, appointed several festivals among the Jews, often without assigning any special reason therefor. One was instituted to perpetuate those great events and wonders which he had wrought in favor of his people. The Sabbath brought to remembrance the fossilized notion of the creation of the world; the Passover, that remarkable departure of God's children out of Egypt. Then there was he feast of Pentacost, the feast of Trumpets, the feast of Expiation or Atonement, the feast of Tents or Tabernacles, the feast of Purim, the Levi feast, the feast of Bread and Wine as the symbol of Christ's body, the feast of Unleavened Bread; but the feast that we attended, did not resemble any of the above to which we have briefly alluded, in fact, the wonderful developments there, would not be endorsed as originating from a super-mundane source by the orthodox world. However, to be better understood, and not mislead the public mind, we desire to state that we do not sanction any of those arrangements that the Scriptures have presented for the ordination of feasts, believing that they are the relics of an age not suitable for imitation at the present time. However, the festival we attended, in one respect, resembled the feast of Trumpet as presented in Leviticus, although the trumpet was not used for precisely the same purpose as there; but in order to be more explicit, we desire to say that, having received a special invitation from Mrs. A. H. Robinson, to be in attendance at her residence, 148 Fourth Avenue, on Monday evening last, we repaired thither, and found present about twenty ladies and gentlemen, including the two noted mediums, Mrs. Maud Lord and Harry Bastian, and it was through their mediumship, that some wonderful developments were to be made. Those present were arranged in a circle, and several musical instruments placed upon the table, when the lights were extinguished, and within three minutes, to the astonishment of all, Mr. Bastian had been so securely tied by the spirits, that the skill of all present (in the light) could not disentangle the knotty knots, and the same agents that accomplished the remarkable feat, had to be called in requisition in order to disengage him from his unpleasant position. Finally, the mediums being so located in the circle that any attempt on their part to perform any of the manifestation, would have been immediately detected, the lights were again extinguished, and then the spirits present made music on the instruments, and entered into a pleasant conversation with those in the circle.

It was really entertaining to hear the different voices of the invisibles communicating, and witness their efforts to convince those present that our friends in the Summer Land can, and do, communicate with the mortals of this earth. But the most pleasing and interesting part of the evening entertainment, consisted in the spirits placing on the table a table-cloth, napkins, dishes, wine, cakes, raisins, oranges, nuts, and other choice delicacies that had been carefully prepared for the occasion by Mrs. Robinson, and set in a pile under the table.

We had the satisfaction of receiving from the materialized hand of one of the spirits a glass of wine and a plate of cake, raisins, etc. Many other guests present at the seance were favored in like manner. Here we find our spirit friends, in order to convince those in attendance of their continued existence, not only putting the articles furnished for the occasion, on the table, but passing a generous portion of each, on a plate, to various guests.

These were convincing tests that spirits do communicate. One, a German spirit, entered into a pleasant conversation with a German friend present, who said that he understood his language perfectly. Not only did those communicating enter into conversation with the circle, but would talk among themselves. We heard one chiding another for her carelessness in spilling some wine when placing it on the table. Indeed, the whole affair passed off pleasantly, and all felt thankful to the mediums and Mrs. A. H. Robinson, for the opportunity of witnessing the startling developments.

The Banner of Light.

We take especial pleasure in thus publicly tendering our unfeigned thanks to Bro. Luther Colby, the senior editor of that old and most excellent Spiritual paper, the BANNER OF LIGHT, for the high compliment paid the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, by publishing, with favorable comments, its leading article in the first number of the present volume, entitled, "VOLUME TEN."

The JOURNAL has, as intimated by the BANNER, reached that exalted position in the estimation of Spiritualists, and that wide circulation, which guarantees success in the enterprise.

This condition has been secured by dint of unflinching perseverance and allegiance to truth on our part, and by the aid of the spirit friends.

Our gratitude to the editors and proprietors of our worthy cotemporary, the BANNER OF LIGHT, for their oft-repeated acts of courtesy, will ever be manifested on suitable occasions, and we trust we shall never forget that an Institution of the same origin, and which was inaugurated for a like purpose, is worthy of due respect, even should they differ radically from us in sentiments uttered. Our journal is peculiarly Western, and to a very great extent reflects that independent spirit—that straight-forward, radical sentiment that marks the most progressive minds of the age, and which is now developing the resources of this great centre of the American Continent, and giving character to the new revolution which is over-turning old systems, and building up in their place a system of philosophy founded in spiritual truths, which are as enduring and permanent as the principles that underlie all life.

Our revered cotemporary was started at a time and in a place compatible with the refined character which it has reflected. It has lead hundreds of thousands from rank skepticism, and from that midnight darkness and gloom, which Old Theology imposes, to a full realization of a happy future life.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, as its name indicates, at a later period arose above the western horizon, to dispense the new light to an outspoken, radical people, who demand a degree of fearlessness in expression that at an earlier period in the history of modern Spiritualism, and especially among the more timid investigators, would not have been tolerated. But as strong meat is suited to full-grown men, so the demand for the JOURNAL, all over the world, is daily increasing,—aye, is indispensable; and but from the fact that we are fully assured by our spirit friends that the supply of inspiration shall ever be equal to the aspiration,—to the demand of all souls—we might with hesitancy and doubting, inquire of ourselves, shall we be equal to the task.

We promise nothing further than to give to our readers, as we shall receive from that never-failing fountain of inspiration guaranteed. But from daily occurrences, we have no doubt we shall, from week to week give our readers the most startling, as well as the most convincing proofs of man's immortality and inter-communion—after the death of the body—with friends remaining in earth-life, and all the incidental benefits to be derived from such spirit-communion.

The Doctor's Bill in Wisconsin.

In another column will be found a report by Bro. F. A. Moore, of Milwaukee, of the doing of the Wisconsin Legislature in regard to the contemptible class legislation of the year before. Great praise is due Hon. D. W. MAXON, of Cedarburg, for his timely action in defeating a measure before the Legislature to still further curtail the rights of the people, and for bringing about the repeal of the old law, which provided for fining and imprisoning mediums who should presume to use their mediumistic powers to heal the sick.

Under the Wisconsin law of last year Christ would have been fined and imprisoned for opening the eyes of the blind and healing as he so often did, to the wonder and astonishment of the old Jews.

The doctors concocted the same law which was passed in Ohio two years ago, and got it adopted by common consent in Wisconsin. No Spiritualist, in or out of the Legislature had pluck enough to open his mouth in opposition to it. Several mediums have been fined and imprisoned in that State during the past year. The doctors thought they could draw the lines a little tighter. They in so doing verified two old sayings;—First: "Whom the gods have determined to destroy, they first make mad;"—Second: "Extremes right themselves."

These old-school quacks thought they would force the thumb-screws one more turn. Mad fools! These extreme measures brought forth a bold and gallant defender of the rights of the people, who failed not in glowing terms to set forth the powers of angelic healers, outside of the "regulars," and the sovereign right of the people to employ whom they pleased, to minister to their physical as well as to their spiritual wants. The action of the Illinois Legislature, under the influence of the "Remonstrances" that went out from this office, backed up the members, and the result was, that instead of the Doctors' Amendment being adopted, the people's friend, the Hon. D. W. MAXON, moved to amend by striking out all after the enacting clause, and substituting a repeal of the original Bill, which was carried triumphantly.

Poor doctors! We wonder if they know that the spirits of their departed patients have made them mad, so that they asked for still greater intolerant legislation, that the "extreme might right itself" by striking a deadly blow at their original Bill? They will learn by and by, that the doctrine that "dead men tell no tales," is a fallacy, and as has been the fate of Orthodox doctors, so will the devotees of Old Theology find their fate to be, ultimately, in their efforts to "put God into the United States Constitution," which is another movement to crush out individual right, and build up sectarianism by class legislation!

REMEMBER, FRIENDS, that this whole opposition, which has been so fatal to this pet movement of pious doctors, was inaugurated by the boldest and most liberal paper published in the world—the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, which is ever vigilant in looking to the rights of mankind,—ever observing the motto, that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty."

Ben Todd.

This energetic worker and lecturer in the cause of Spiritualism and reform, who has been upon the Pacific Coast for several years, is about to return East, and will lecture wherever desired between San Francisco and Chicago. Spiritualists, and all liberal minds in Colorado, Nevada, Utah, Nebraska, and Iowa, should avail themselves of this opportunity to obtain the services of Bro. Todd. He goes to San Francisco to hold a discussion with Elder Miles Grant before starting. Bro. Todd will receive subscriptions for, and look after the interests of, the JOURNAL in his travels. Address him until further notice, at Grass Valley, Cal., care of Thomas Loyd, Esq.

Dr. J. Wilbur.

We understand that Dr. J. Wilbur, who has been making a successful tour through Illinois and neighboring states, healing the sick, will, in response to the urgent demands of his patients in this city, return home at once, and may be consulted at his residence, No. 460 West Randolph street, on and after the 11th of this month.

Shorts.

We are not "short on wheat," [illegible] short on matter for the JOURNAL, nor [illegible] short for money, but we are short the post office address of Bro. Robert Shorts, who sends five dollars to apply on subscriptions, but fails to give his P. O. address, or that of his sister.

To Investigators.

Harry Bastian, Mrs. Maud [illegible] Bangs children, are now in the [illegible] seances, affording skeptics and investigators a rare oportunity to become convinced of the truthfulness of the Harmonial Philosophy. No better mediums are before the public than they are.

Mrs. Orrin Abbott.

The return of this superior developing medium to Chicago is hailed with pleasure by her hosts of friends. She may be consulted at room five, 190 So. Clark street.

Dr. Dake,

The indefatigable laborer in the field of reform, goes this week to Beloit, Wis.

Mrs. F. A. Logan

Has gone to Wisconsin, where she will answer calls to lecture on Spiritualism, Woman's Rights, and Temperance. Address, Genesee, Wis.

Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson

Delivered four lectures at Alton, Ind., this week, and goes from there to Troy.

—The proprietors of the Spurrier House, Louisville, Ky., are clever fellows, and know how to keep a hotel.

J. W. REED, what is your P. O. address?

TESTIMONIAL.

Miss Hazeltine's first letter to Mrs. Robinson:

"Mrs. A. H. Robinson, enclosed find two dollars, for which, please send prescription for my mother,—age forty years. She has been troubled with lame back for several years, and now within the past five weeks has had a terrible headache—a racking pain through the left eye, piercing to the back of the head and neck.

She is not confined to the bed, except a part of each day, when she is suffering from that terrible headache.

If you can help relieve her, you will have the lasting gratitude of herself and family. I send you a lock of her hair."

Yours, &c.,

MISS NETTIE HAZELTINE.

Buck Creek, Wis., Feb. 27th, 1871.

Mrs. Robinson diagnosed the case and sent a prescription. Miss Hazeltine's second letter to Mrs. Robinson:

Your prescription came to hand, and at your request I will report progress. We followed the direction, I believe to the letter, with very satisfactory results. Mother has had no more of that terrible headache, and very little return of backache. She does not gain strength so fast as I would wish, but I know that time, and care alone can build up that great loss of vital force, which her never strong constitution has sustained. I am very grateful to you for forwarding (so promptly) the prescription, although, I only sent you $3.00 which at the time I rent, supposed to be your regular fee. Enclosed please find the balance $1.00 which will, I believe square our accounts, for the present. Should she again need medical aid, I shall promptly come to you with faith: I believe you are what you claim to be,—a reliable healing medium.

Yours for truth,

MISS NETTIE HAZELTINE.

Another and Thrilling Chapter of the Brinkley College "Ghost" Sensation.

Last evening a number of persons, friends of the family, were sitting in the parlors of J. R. Robertson, Esq., No. 291 Dunlap street, when the house has become quite prominent in connection with the spook sensation, when a noise was heard in the back yard, as of some persons talking. Mr. R. remarked that some person was evidently in the yard, and went out to see what was the matter.

Nothing Was Seen or Heard of Him for about five minutes, when a servant man known as Joe, came running into the parlor, and said that Mr. Robertson was Lying Dead in the Back Part of His Yard.

Several of the gentlemen, accompanied by Joe, immediately proceeded to where Mr. R. was, and found him lying insensible in a pool of blood, near a small stable in the rear of his lot. He was carried into the house, a physician was sent for, and in a few moments Dr. R. J. Shaw arrived, and at once administered restoratives, and proceeded to examine the wounds upon Mr. R.'s head. He found that appeared as if made with a knife or some sharp instrument, extending about four inches over the forehead, from the left eye back towards the crown of his head, and also the marks of a person's fingers upon his throat, as if he had been choked.

It was about half an hour before Mr. Robertson was fully restored to consciousness, and in a condition to state how he had received his wounds. One of the gentlemen present, immediately after Mr. Robertson was discovered, came to the Avalanche office and related the fact of the assault, but could give no other particulars than that he had been assaulted.

A reporter of this paper at once proceeded to Mr. Robertson's residence, and received the following Particulars of the Outrage.

From the sufferer himself:

He said that he was sitting in his parlor talking to his visitors, when some one remarked that they thought they heard a noise in the back yard, and he, believing that he would be back in a few minutes, started out, and when he got out of the house he could see no one, and walking back, entered an out-house attached to the premises. Just as he stepped in the out house, he noticed.

A Couple of Men Standing under a Low Wood-Shed about ten feet from where he was. He had but just noticed them, and had not had time to give any alarm, when the men rushed out from under the shed, and caught hold of him, one of them at the same instant and telling him to give no alarm, or they would kill him. Mr. R. states that he asked them not to shoot him, when they ordered him out of the house, in the door of which he was standing, and then, with a pistol in his face, marched him about twenty five yards to the extreme rear of the lot, to where a small stable is situated. When they got in there, they were met by two other men, who evidently were waiting for them.

Shoving a Pistol in Front of His Face,

As soon as they were in the stable, one of the men said to him:

"We Have Come After that Jar, and you have got to tell us where it is, or we'll kill you." Mr. R., fearing for his life, told them the jar was underneath the seat in the out-house attached to a rope, and told them how to get it. Two of the men at once started to the out-house, while the other two remained with him, guarding him, with and threatening to kill him if he attempted to escape, or made any noise.

In about two minutes the two men returned with the jar in their possession, when one of the men who had been guarding the prisoner suddenly grasped him by the throat, and applying a vile epithet to him, commenced

Choking Him Severely.

Mr. Robertson begged the man for God's sake not to kill him, as they now had what they wanted; and while he was still speaking, another of the ruffians over the head with what he supposed was a pistol, and rendered him unconscious. Just before he was struck he cried out, "Oh, Joe, come to me quick!" and it was this cry evidently that caused him to be struck.

It is supposed that the men fled immediately after hitting him, as when his servant, Joe, arrived a few moments later, no trace of them was to be seen. When the servant did reach the scene, which was as soon as he could get there after hearing the cry for help, he found that gentleman, as we have stated, lying in an insensible condition in a pool of blood just outside of the stable door, and upon making the discovery, at once gave the alarm.

Mr. Robertson says that he had a good look at the two assailants who were under the wood shed and made the first attack upon him. He described one of them as being a man of medium size, light hair, light complexion, dressed in a suit of light clothes, and the other as tall, of dark complexion, with dark hair, and dressed in a suit of dark clothes. He did not notice any distinguishing marks beyond those above given upon the men, but thinks he could recognize them if he were to see them again.

Dr. Shaw had carefully dressed his wounds, and he felt very well, beyond a sharp pain in his head, caused by the wound.

Warned of Violence.

He states that he received on Monday morning, a letter telling him that violence was intended him, but thought nothing of it until this attack; and yesterday evening when he came home from his office, he brought a letter from Mr. Nourse, who is stopping at his house, telling her that violence was intended him for his connection with the jar.

The question now is, who attacked him? and at whose instigation was the attack made? Are there any persons who feared the result of the jar opening? Were the ruffians actuated by a desire to plunder, believing the jar's contents to be valuable? Facts stand on the most probable theory that Mr. R., during the entire excitement growing out of the Brinkley College affair, has only, like hundreds of others, sought to unravel the mystery; is a man whose life is blameless, and we doubt if he has a personal enemy in the world.

From the Avalanche, March 29.

The effects of the ghost story on the mental tabernacle of the Appeal, are sad to contemplate. We hoped that with the return of clear skies, the paroxysms would cease. But it appears that the malady is too deeply seated for even bright, warm sunshine and the heartfelt sympathy of sorrowing friends to reach. Our worst fears seem to be realized. Here is the latest paroxysm as developed only yesterday. How much the little pink spook has to answer for!

It has been reserved to Bishop Quintard to put a quietus to the ghost humbug. It will be seen by the following card that "no part of the proceeds" derived from the proposed exhibition will be accepted by the Church Home:

Editors Appeal:—Will you kindly inform the public that the exhibition announced for Thursday night next, at the Greenlaw Opera House, not being approved, no part of the proceeds will be accepted by the Church Home.

C. T. QUINTARD,
President Board of Managers.

Episcopal Residence, March 27.

Brave! Bishop Quintard deserves the thanks of every good citizen for thus repudiating and washing his hands, and the hands of his church, of all connection with a delusion which a sensational newspaper has concocted for the purpose of exhibiting its "enterprize," and speculating on the weak-minded, the credulous and the superstitious. If money was to be made out of the absurd fraud, the public, of course, much preferred that it should go into the hands of the noble-hearted ladies, who, in adversity, storm and snow, have been ministering angels to the orphans and of the Church Home. But once this institution refuses to accept money derived from such a source, we hope, for the sake of common decency, that the ghost humbug will be buried out of sight forever. It has been fruitful of untold and incalculable evils, and its authors should be made to suffer for the injuries they have brought upon Brinkley College, and the impressible minds of the young and superstitious. Money made by fraud is like the dead sea fruit which turns to ashes on the lips. Humbuggery may win for a day, but the recoil comes just as surely as 'chickens come home to roost." The sensational newspaper that profited by the fraud it helped to perpetrate, is the first to laugh at its victims, but the dupes are the first to execrate the paper that swindled them. Now that the ghost swindle and its authors have become the subjects of contempt, we suggest that the ghost organ hunt up a new contraban to interview, or another flatboat wreck at the mouth of Wolf river. If these fail to produce a sensation, interview Roberts at the jail, and rehash the Ada Jones murder. Why don't the enterprising journal give us something about the Cardiff Giant, or the sea serpent? Anything for enterprise.

BROTHER JONES:—I send you this morning the finale of the jar as published in the Avalanche. On Sunday evening, I addressed a note to Mr. J. R. Robertson, warning him against the proposed exhibition at the Greenlaw Opera House, where the jar was to be opened according to his published card, announcing that the proceeds would be given to the Orphan's Home. I told him he knew nothing of the uncontrollable nature of influence, that in the sea of such an excitement, must prove disastrous to his own personal safety and the reputation of his family. The card of Bishop Quintard yesterday, gave loose rein to the devils incarnate to bring about the same results. I feared for the public jar opening on to-morrow evening, when I assured him a clamor would be as uncontrollable as that which burned witches, and martyrs at the stake, and hung Christ upon the cross.

The little girl Clara is one of the most powerful mediums, wholly undeveloped, except by spiritual agencies since the first appearance of the spirit of Lizzie, who has most wonderful and extraordinary powers to do almost anything, to demonstrate before skeptics spirit-power. She is taken up bodily in a chair, and carried about the room, moving the piano, and rocked in a common chair by spirit power when in a stiffened position in her trance, when not a muscle moves, nor do her eyes wink, but are wide open, and in such condition, with a screen before her, she will write and personate in hand-writing and style, the appearance of various persons who are recognized in an unequivocal manner, who were well known, and have died. These things are testified to me, by what are considered the most prominent and reliable skeptical persons, who are not to be imposed upon, and who have been conversant with spirit manifestations for years. Though I am personally acquainted with Mr. Robertson, and my wife intimately with Clara and the whole family, we have been so desirous that all this phenomena should proceed outside of those who know or recognize spiritual manifestations, that we have not only purposely avoided any connection with it, but have not visited them, lest the public should say that it was originated among those favorable to Modern Spiritual Philosophy. The only two views entertained in regard to the outrage is, that it was caused by the thieves for the valuables, or by a concocted plan of those who ran the risk of their lives to prevent, what is generally believed, a title or valuables, or both, from being made public, that did exist as a buried treasure, which has caused the house to be haunted for years.

A word about Bishop Quintard, whose card I send you, putting a quietus on the orphans ever being benefitted by spiritual efforts. About fifteen years ago, he was a broken-down physician, and it is said peddled prescriptions here in the streets, at a quarter of a dollar each; got church influence, and rose by its power till he received church orders. He now fares sumptuously, at a fine salary and its perquisites. His rival, Dr. Rogers, who was thus obliged to make use of Southern credulity and enthusiasm, who pocketed the proceeds of the Orphan Asylum scheme, and took eleven thousand dollars with his family to Europe, spent it, and returned to make a raise by a lecturing tour on High Church and Catholic humbug, and has large houses even in liberal Chicago, is about to retire to the practice of law.

Although the common school is destroying the authority of the church, the mourning requiem has a tyrannical wail, which is prolonged by those who fight principalities and powers, instead of the great fight of faith, and they hurl their javelins toward those spiritually inclined, so that I have really considered it dangerous to become more active than by works to prove that there is a new system of medical philosophy. Not even more than to Spiritualists who know its origin, do I admit that to spiritual power am I indebted for what has even silently awakened the liberal curiosity of physicians abroad. The present of this persecutory power here, when Spiritualism has but a small foothold, has driven my practice into sixteen states outside of this, while every now and then overtures are made for me to join some church and be made independently rich. Even the great Baptist gun in the South against Spiritualism, Rev. J. R. Graves has thus desired to turn convincing power given entirely through high spiritual forces, to the advantage of his paper and church, and told me he could make me a rich man by joining his church and using his pew.

How long shall selfishness, and a desire to be rich become the incentive for the joining the church, and keeping up church organizations, instead of simple principles of charity, good will and adherence to strict integrity and love for man?

"Our church minister," and "our church physician," are both flattering upon that authority of reverence which is linked together to oppose the rights and spiritual gifts of healing, in Illinois and Michigan, as well as in Tennessee. But the unseen powers are shaking the world from this chaos of darkness, whence light will eventually come, at the fiat of a creative band who speak, and it is done,—who move upon the mind in their own mysterious way.

Letter from N. E. Doane.

BRO. JONES.—Some kind unknown friend has furnished me with the regular issue of the "JOURNAL," since the first of January last, to appease the hunger of my soul for spiritual food; and well it serves to cheer the weary hours of my infirmity, but No. 1, of volume X. I did not get. Will you please send it? It is needless for me to say that it would be very hard to do without your paper.

And thanks to the powers of Mrs. Severance, at White Water, Wis., by which I am regaining my health.

Permit me to say for the benefit of others, that after having been an invalid for two years, and my case considered hopeless by those according-to-law-doctors, I applied to Mrs. Mary Severance (whom I never have seen), who, by a lock of my hair, described my case precisely, and recommended a course of treatment, which in the space of four weeks has insured another lease of life; besides, as I grow in health, I am becoming developed as a medium. Truly, the beauties of life are only seen in the enjoyment of health.

Narrative of a Dark Spirit.

NUMBER THREE.

We have received the name of this spirit from himself directly and through two mediums, but do not think it necessary to give it here. Joseph Antonio were the two surnames given first and as he prefers the latter, we shall call him by that. We give below a communication received through Mrs. Juliette Yeaw, of Northboro, Mass. It is from a little spirit named Pale Lily, who frequently communicates through this medium. We shall not attempt to give it in the Indian dialect as it was spoken to us.

"You will have a brighter history to write of that spirit, than it will bear no more comparison to the one you have given, than the brightest starlight-night does to the darkest and gloomiest night that ever enveloped your earth.

When you first saw that spirit, he was in a condition that entirely disqualified him from being reached and aided by those in spirit-life. Such spirits must first be aided by those in the form, who have strong souls and have love enough to suffer with and for them, and thus aid them in taking their first progressive steps.

He is hardly yet in that condition that his gratitude is awakened. I mean a deep sense of gratitude.

He was so degraded, was sunk so low in degradation, the chains had been on him so many years, that it will take a long time for him to realize the obligations, and extend a helping hand to those who helped him to reach better conditions.

He is approaching that state where there will be a deep and abiding gratitude for all the pains and physical suffering that he has inflicted. He will remunerate you, and extend a helping hand to you in many directions. Every time that he can come in rapport with any person from whom he can receive better and purer magnetism, it will benefit him, and there are those who have positive power sufficient to throw it off, so that they will not be injured, while they aid him very much. I see that you will not be obliged to suffer much more physically from his approaches and visitations, and you have a compensation for all the suffering inflicted upon you by such spirits. In order to understand his condition, you had to suffer physically therefrom, but now he has got out of those horrible pits, those real hells in which you found him, yet the condition in which he now is, is dreary and desolate enough, but if he can't come out of this at once, he must grow out of it.

When he fully senses the errors of his past earthly and spiritual life, and better aspirations are awakened, of course to correspond with it, there will be intensified feelings of remorse and sorrow. He may, perhaps, suffer more than he has in the past, because with a better appreciation of higher conditions, will come also increasing sensitiveness to suffering.

You are, in the future, to write from time to time many chapters of his life experiences in the spirit world. At each progressive stage of his development, you will receive a fresh chapter of his experiences, which, beside being a benefit to the spirit, will give to you many new and clearer ideas of the spheres of spirit-life, and they will also be very instructive and useful to those who shall read them.

I am not able to speak directly to this spirit, but I see that he is coming up into what your friend calls the sphere of indifference. He is separated from those other spirits that you saw with them. The association is wholly broken up. The association, too, with the young woman, and the chains which bound him to her, are completely broken, and the connection can never be resumed. If she has any such influences now, it comes from others not so bad as he was.

The conditions about her are not such that it would be impossible for her to be subjected to attack from others, but she can never be subject to that influence again, or any other of so dark and terrible a nature. There may be those undeveloped, but not so dark in their interior conditions as that spirit, still have power over her at times. It would not be natural to suppose that so sudden a change could be produced.

If you have gone down a stairway of many steps, you will have to come up just as many to get back. So in physical disease, the physician knows, that if a patient has been going down step by step for a long time, there must be a long continued ascension, and that, step by step, and it is more difficult to go up the stairs than doing so, it may in these cases require much greater effort to get up.

Every time you bring her into rapport with harmonious conditions, such as your circle has experienced, you lessen her susceptibility to such influences, and thus bring her into better conditions, and enable her to take one step upwards.

This narrative you have written will be very instructive to many others, for the paper comes under the eyes of thousands of people, and there are throughout the land very many cases somewhat similar, and the friends of these will receive therefrom many valuable suggestions which will aid in the treatment of other cases that need light in this direction. You had better describe more fully what the circle has done."

This young woman has had convulsions for about twenty years, and was so boisterous and unruly that the family were obliged to place her in an asylum.

She had been under many and various forms of treatment, and at our suggestion, it was proposed that Miss Yeaw should see her. At the first interview, she said:

"This was a very sensitive child, and influences have been brought around her in early life, by undeveloped spirits, who were ignorant of what they were doing. These have fastened themselves upon her, and are unable now to leave her."

They did not promise very much, but suggested that we should form a circle of harmonious persons, who should sit twice a week with her. This plan was carried out, and we have met pretty regularly, except during the severe winter weather. The result has been that this spirit has been thus far removed from her condition of slavery, and the condition of the young woman is much improved; we do not say cured, for that will require a long time, but we are all satisfied that great good has resulted, both to ourselves and the patient, though she is still a sufferer, and we do not expect an immediate recovery.

"If Christians believe that Jesus preached to spirits in prison, as they profess to, why can they not believe that others can do so also?"

We replied that some said it was the God nature in Jesus, and not his human nature.

She said, "That is true: it is the God nature in everybody that does this.

There are two spirits here, whose narratives you wrote—Dr. Ackley and Hughes. They have been in dark conditions themselves, and having worked out of them into better conditions, they are glad to aid him. He is in a condition now to be helped by those in the other life, and must be helped by those who have had something similar in their own experiences, which will bring them into rapport with him. I don't think I ever saw a spirit in whom the divine spark was so nearly extinguished, as it was in him, when you first began to work for him. He was in one of the very lowest hells of spiritual existence.

Dr. Ackley will shortly give you two chapters in relation to this dark spirit and his condition in spirit life, and he will have something more to say about himself before long.

When he becomes sufficiently developed to sense the horrible conditions that he has passed through, and to realize the enormity of the crimes he has committed, he must pass through the most terrible ordeals of suffering, and he will have a mission to the earth-life, the object of which will be to assist in breaking just such chains as are being broken for him now. I find that that is the way in the spirit life; that the wrongs of earth are to be righted by each individual working out their own salvation, and when in this progressive life they find that they have committed a wrong and been guilty of error, as soon as they realize the beauty of better condition, they have a mission to the earth-life to seek those who are passing through similar experiences of wrong and error, and to aid and help them. Thus in the place of wrong committed in the earth-life, they become instrumental in averting similar wrongs and substituting good in their places.

This is the way people work out their salvation. It is not enough to sense in the other life that there has been wrong doing, and to look for higher and better things, but these higher and better things can never be attained, nor can there be any true progress until there is a mission performed in earth-life—until the good that should have been wrought by that person has been wrought through the instrumentalities of those who are still in the form. If any person strives to shrink from a duty in earth-life, they can not progress in spirit-life until they come back and take up its burden again.

Just as in this life, if you have done a wrong, you don't feel good until you have made reparation, and you don't change yourself when you get into the other world. This spirit has a great work to do, he must pass through similar experiences with others, and help them out of their conditions.

He has never understood the true uses of life, and has never known its true enjoyments. He must come back, and by doing good here begin his heaven on earth; it can never be begun any where else for any spirit, and if they have failed to realize this while in the earth-life, they must, as he has been, be brought back to earth by some good and loving human being, and when they have commenced their labors there and begun to realize some of the enjoyments thereof, they will be prepared for enjoyment in spirit-life.

He has a long, dark and thorny road before him, but it will gradually grow lighter, less thorny and brighter.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium;

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

MRS. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

Mrs. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well when the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $3.00; each subsequent, $2.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $3; answering Business Letters, $3. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

THE INTELLECTUAL PROGRESS OF THE HUMAN RACE,

A Lecture by Mrs. Emma Hardinge in the Cleveland Assembly Rooms, London, Sunday Evening, January 29, 1871.

What do our teachers tell us of human destiny? Three voices answer. One, from the altars of religion, informs us that man was made perfect and designed for protection, but by his own disobedience, his own volition, fell into hopeless degradation, and can only be redeemed by a strange and mysterious transformation, in which he has no part. Science answers us in different modes—some pointing to an intellectual progress for the race, and others assuming that there is no progress, but that the order of being perpetually repeats itself. Another voice shall be uttered this night, and that not from the Spiritualistic stand-point, but from your own places of observation. The claim set up by those who refer us to the first chapters of the books labelled "sacred" the Holy Word of God, is that the Almighty himself revealed by inspiration to Moses the exact origin of man and the truths of his destiny. If this were so, we can only say that the revelation was entirely superfluous; for ages ere Moses was, the same revelation was made to older nations, and stereotyped in older scriptures. All the nations of antiquity had the same history, namely, that man was born to perfection, placed in a paradisiacal garden, and by an act of disobedience fell from his high estate; that he was expelled from the garden of Eden—that thus sin and sorrow were entailed upon him, and that his present condition is one of punishment and degradation. But these nations, instead of claiming that this teaching was a direct revelation from God, taught that it was an allegorical interpretation of man's own view of his origin—myths, idealities impersonated in imaginary characters. These ancient authorities inform us that man, the original Adam, was a barbarian—a poor helpless savage, who, in the childlike condition of his innocence or ignorance, beheld this earth as a garden. In the course of time he ate of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge—the tree always representing the gradual progression and order of being. As he developed the appetite for intellectual knowledge, his paradise was transformed into that condition of civiliz tion which entails labor, a search after the satisfaction of his wants, a migration from his present easy condition. The battle of life commences in the youth and develops in the manhood of the race in precisely the same fashion as our infants leave the paradise of their mother's arms to go forth and taste of the tree of knowledge in the school-house, and become expelled from the paradise of home and the enjoyment of innocence as they develop into the stern realities of man. This is all the allegorical explanation which the wise ancients deemed it necessary to bestow. It is only the wise and intellectual magnates of high ecclesiastical modern institutions who can discover that these fabulous impersonations are actual beings whom they must fall down and worship. But "Great is Diana of the Ephesians." We do not desire to spoil the modern trade in image making, and all the advantages that grow therefrom. But as ours is a platform free from all idolatries—as the universal Spirit whom we know, whom we comprehend, as we learn the nature of the spiritual existence, and may worship as God our Father—as this viewless image of our own spirits is all that we recognize, we have no Diana of the Ephesians to bow before, and hence we may venture to search a little behind Moses to discover where he received his reflected ideas from. If, then, this image falls to the ground, and resolves itself into a mere shadowy allegory, the whole superstructure falls with it.

We will now attempt to solve the problem so frequently quoted by the non-progressionists of our own time, who assume that the lost arts, as they call them, prove that we are running the round of a circle of time and that intellectual development that must bring us back to the point from whence we started. In support of their view they point to the vast blocks of stone of which the ancient monuments are composed, and question by what power these enormous masses were torn from the quarry and upheaved into the magnificent proportions of the colossal temples of the East. These, say they, give evidence of a mechanical knowledge and power far exceeding any we possess. They point to the fact that the art of dyeing and the chemistry of mixing colors known to the ancients must have exceeded any knowledge of our own. They point to the enormous colossal figures which are perpetually found in the most magnificent excavations as an evidence of sublimity of thought and grandeur of design, no less than magnificence of achievement. They point to the fact that as China and India are totally unprogressive, we may realize the nature of their art and science thousands of years ago, the beauty of their sculptures and carvings, and the exquisite minutiæ of their fabrics. Even in Egypt, they remind us, they had music, and poetry, and painting, and their systems of Hygiene far surpass our own; they understood the virtues of animal and mineral magnetism and the lost art of magic; they could produce artificial somnambulism, and exalt the mind into those ecstatic conditions which we now call the spiritual state.

Now let us go a little beneath the surface, and see what these voiceless monuments tell us of the nature, the character, the habits, the intellectual status of the people whose remains are thus highly lauded. All these remains are dedicated to worship. We never find the remains of human habitations, of manufactories, of galleries of art, factories. All we find are what we perceive is the result of enormous brute force. When we question how these mighty stones were raised, we find that was the work of thousands and thousands of captives. Human life as of no account with these virtuous, wise ancients. The chief arts they practiced were agriculture and war, and devotion to the gods of terror. The very gigantic forms of their monuments and the sublimity of their structure prove that their conception of the Deific power was only that of strength. Even the Christians' favorite record shows us that the chief occupation of the oppressed and almost captive Jews was the preparation of stones for the erection of these vast colossal forms. They neither possess utilitarianism, nor beauty, nor use, nor comfort. When you ask after the sweet graces of life—the tender care of the aged, the respect of women, the love of children—what do you find? The aged thrown to the crocodile of the Nile, to propitiate the savage monsters supposed to incarnate a portion of Divinity from their excessive strength; young children only esteemed as representatives who shall carry down to posterity the strength, the power, and possessions of their ancestors; the hideous law of caste ever dividing the race, by unkind lines of demarcation, into sacred and profane. It is only as we see the gradual declension of the East—it is only as we realize that the first cycle of time in the destiny of man is closing, that the East is dying, that the Orient and its genius have worked out and fulfilled their mission, and that a new dispensation is and holy words of Jesus, the first recognition of the value of human life and the worth of the individual soul. He who commended even the falling sparrow to the providence of his Creator—He that declared that there was a sacredness in the single hair of a head that God had made—He who pointed to the publican, and the sinner, and the outcast, and the murderer, and clasped them all in the arms of his brotherly love—He is the redeeming power of the dark and terrible East, and for this He perished—for this He was obnoxious to the ruling genius of the East.

There is another element which we find wanting in the first period of our civilization, that is, the recognition that permanence is not the genius of human life—that we are called upon to pass through the crucible of death—that death is the builder, not alone the destroyer—that as the forms of the present hour die, they are the Phœnix from whose ashes shall arise forms that are fresher, fairer, and more beautiful.

Now let me pass on to another period of our review, a period when we arrive at those grand and glorious gates that open up the knowledge of European science in Greece and Rome. Here at least we must acknowledge that the labors of antiquity meet at our petty efforts to model after them. Greece and Rome we are told still present to us evidences of scientific attainments before which all our frail attempts at imitation grow pale and insignificant. We are pointed back to the glorious Colosseum, to the beautiful Parthenon, to all those magnificent sculptures and reliefs in which the human form is so exquisitely represented that the very perfection of beauty starts out from the marble. We are referred to the fact that one of the noblest of mechanical ideas was started by Archimedes, that one of the greatest developments of the problems upon which creation is founded, geometry and mathematics, was originated by Euclid and Pythagoras. We are pointed to the fact that no purer system of ethics was ever taught than by the virtuous Socrates, and that all the beauty of which we can conceive is to be found in the philosophy of Plato. We are pointed to the subtlety of Aristotle, the eloquence of Cicero, the grandeur of the power by which Demosthenes moved the multitude—to the writings of Æschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles, the first great lyrists. What comedies can we boast of that equal those of Aristophanes? What possible power can equal the beautiful development of physical strength and beauty exhibited in the whole history of the very religion of Greece and Rome? We look upon these beautiful monuments of art; we read of these glorious achievements; we hear of the virtue of Roman matrons and the purity of Roman maidens, so exalted above our own that we bow our heads with shame in the contrast. More, we are obliged to borrow literature of these ancient Greeks and Romans to form for us to instruct our youth. Their languages are the purest sounds that the tongue of our classical y instructed youth can syllable; their plays, their orations, their verses, underlie all our forms of high education. Too good still to be polluted by vulgar lips, they may not even be translated, in order that they may be the digest of the first grand, luminous classical isolation for the use of the well-educated and the rich alone. Now let us draw the veil once again. What was the use of their beauty, and what the result of their wise laws, and philosophical teachings, and magnificent structures, and noble institutions? We find, again, that these exquisitely beautiful forms, these magnificent sculptures, were dedicated not to the living gods, and chiefly designed for objects of worship. Suppose, however, that we enter some of those that were dedicated exclusively to the amusements and enjoyments of the people. Let us take a representative specimen and enter the Colosseum at Rome. Let us re-people those magnificent galleries, those vast terraces, with the noble Romans, the victorious eagle-crowned warriors, the pure maidens, and the virtuous matrons, with plebeians and patricians, with reverend senators and highly-instructed orators—what do we find there? Looking upon long lines of helpless captives gathered from different portions of the earth, the spoils of war, who have been dragged in chains to their city, and then exposed in the amphitheatre, not for the amusement of these pure maidens and virtuous matrons, torn limb from limb, mangled, destroyed in the most hideous and unnameable tortures by the fangs of wild beasts! Oh, let us turn from the sight with abhorrence. Humanity was nothing then, but the achievements and intellectual powers of humanity were applauded. Still, we find that the genius of the people was power. This for enslavability which cultivates the Demosthenes of the age—what is it but the attempt to develop the high power of eloquence which gives control? What do all the philosophies of Plato and Pythagoras, Aristotle and Cicero, the Epicurean and Stoics, amount to? Do they give us consolation in the hour of death? Do they give us comfort in the moment of bereavement and adversity? Do they teach our young children to grow up kind, and just, and merciful, and pure, and loving? Do they give us mastery over the elements? Do they teach us the designs for which the mighty armies of the fiery skies are strung out on the plains of heaven? Child whisper we all, but never touches the heart—it never administers to the wants and woes of dear humanity—it never makes a warm pulse throb through the heart; it instructs the brain, but it goes no lower. These classical studies that we so laud, most fortunately for our common people, most fortunately for the virtue of our women and the purity of our maidens, still remain in dead languages. We fill—not dare to translate them—were we to do so, the obscenities, and the horrors, and the impurities that are to be found in the comedies of this same Aristophanes, in the verses of this same Ovid, in the hideous amours of the gods, in the horrors that are represented by these same great tragic poets, Sophylus, Euripides, would cause such a wave of burning blush on the cheek of our pure maidens, and make our virtuous matrons' ears tingle for shame. Perhaps it were better that our young gentlemen were not instructed in these—perhaps it would be more wholesome if, instead of recurring to the animalisms of matter with which we are associated for the necessities of earth-life, for the mundane of the earth in which we live—perhaps it were better that the better spirituality of our souls should be elevated by the purer and nobler strains of our modern literature. There are those in our own day who can "lift our souls to heaven," but we know very few of the classical writings that will not drag us down to that animalism through which we are progressing as a world, but which should not be the only thought or the highest means of instruction that immortal souls should ponder upon. These glorious marbles, these beautiful forms so highly lauded—we can scarcely look upon them without speculating upon the character of the monstrous impurity of thought which developed them. We can pass amidst these old classical cities and not realize that the highest arts of the people were to minister to luxury, to pander to the most impure tastes, and to recall the lowest nature than to stimulate the highest thoughts with which the mind can be filled. So much for classical literature, and classical beauty, and classical employment; and if we want to know something more about their forms of worship, why, follow the wild orgies of the Bacchantes—follow them through the streets, with their shrieks, and wails, and attitudes, and gestures, and rites, which indeed do not bear translation, and then we shall realize that whilst these Greek and Roman fathers of ours did advance to the gates of art and science, and were entrusted with a mason's trowel and the bricks that should be the corner-stone of the temples of art and science, they were still not permitted to enter the temple where there reigns supreme, as the noblest and highest form of worship, the grand man, God, and his creature, Man. They had not yet learned to appreciate man—they did not know him; they knew him only in his beautiful form, in his athletic sports, in his strength as a creature to be conquered if he was of an opposite nation; they did not know him in the real object and purpose of life.

Now we pass to the last stage to which we propose to carry forward our review, and that is the period which, however rude and crude, ushers in to the van of civilization, as the two leaders of the army of progress, the nations of Great Britain and France, and the other different countries of Europe as followers. Nothing is lost out of the hands of our God. All the past has been bequeathed to us, and as much as is good and useful has been used again, and built into foundation stones upon which we have built the superstructures of a higher art and science. The first development of art and science to which we have the least right to boast in European civilization is the discovery of the mariner's compass and the application of the printing press. Not a footprint of humanity is made but what is engraved by the printing press; not a thought that humanity has conceived but what is there stereotyped; not an achievement that humanity has ever arrived at but what we find there; and one single book possessed by me makes me the equal of these sublime ancients—places me on a footing with them—bestows upon me the work, labor, thought, power, and possibilities of a million generations. Again than this, it is not for you and me alone. As we repeat our multiform process and send them forth over the earth, and dispose of our sheets broadcast to every land of civilization, the houseless, wandering vagrant, if he can read, is equal to the monarch on his throne; his knowledge opens up to him all the sources of power that man has ever made use of. By the aid of the mariner's compass we have not only left the coast line which was formerly the boundary of discovery and experiment in past ages, but we have put the girdle of knowledge around our world; we have compassed all its islands and its continents; we have explored its great forests and ascended to its mountain-tops, and we have now made of its oceans one great family of human beings. We build no more pyramids—we sculpture out no more cave temples; we do not want them. In their place let us ascend to the highest range of one of our industrial palaces. The bricks and mortar of which they are composed, instead of having been fashioned century after century by the unwilling hands of captives, have, by labor-saving machinery, been formed in a few brief days, and elevated to their places with very little trouble. Ascend to the highest range, and there you find the growth of the cotton field, the raw material gathered up no longer, thanks to the God of progress and the Father of all men, by the unwilling hands of chained captives, but by free men in the exercise of their noblest prerogatives, and by the digest of their

Given During the Years 1860 to 1870, inclusive, — from FRANKLIN, LINCOLN, ADAMS, JACKSON, WEBSTER, PENN.

and others to the Author.

THOMAS RICHMOND.

This is one of the most interesting books in the whole catalogue of Spiritualist publications. Its author is well and widely known throughout the Western States, he having been one of the early pioneers and a man of extraordinary energy and ability, who would make its mark in any country. After an active business life of over sixty years, he now, in his seventy-fifth year, is as strong and hearty, and as capable of doing business as he was fifty years ago. His ability, energy, and acquaintance with many of the leading men of the country, pointed him out to Franklin and other distinguished spirits as the most fitting instrument with which they were to accomplish a mighty undertaking. The manner in which they worked through him and the results achieved are herein related by the author in a book of 336 pages.

PRICE: Cloth, $1.50; postage, 16 cents. Enamled paper sides and cloth back, 75 cents: postage, 6 cents.

For Sale, Wholesale and Retail, by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 187 & 189 South Clark street, Chicago.

NEW EDITION—REVISED AND CORRECTED.

THE VOICES
Three Poems.

VOICE OF SUPERSTITION.
VOICE OF NATURE.
VOICE OF A PEBBLE.

By Warren Sumner Barlow.

THIS volume is startling in its originality of purpose, and is destined to make deeper inroads among sectarian bigots than any work that has hitherto appeared.

The Voice of Superstition is the creed of the creed, and proven by numerous passages from the Bible that the God of Moses has been defeated by Satan, from the Garden of Eden to Mount Calvary.

The Voice of Nature represents God in the light of Reason and Philosophy—in His unchangeable and glorious attributes. While others have too often only demolished, the author has erected a beautiful Temple on the ruins of Superstition. Judge Baker, of Frontier Department.

BY.....E. V. WILSON

Discussion Between E. V. Wilson and Rev. Clark Braden.

[Notes taken during a Discussion on the Resolution,—"Resolved, That the Bible, King James' Version, contains Modern Spiritualism in all its Phases and Teachings."]

E. V. Wilson affirms.—Rev. Clark Braden denies.

SUMMING UP OF MR. WILSON.

The defense in this discussion has not traversed the resolution, which reads:

Resolved: That modern Spiritualism is worthy the support and confidence of the people.

Hence, Mr. Braden should have followed us, instead of leading off into subjects foreign to the resolution.

Our opening remarks covered the whole ground, explaining the words sustain, teachings, support, confidence, in their relative sense to each other. We then called your attention to law and testimony. We again repeat that you must be governed by the clear reading of the law under which this resolution was brought; the law of parliamentary usages.

The law requires you to throw out all testimony irrelevant or foreign to the resolution—and you are equally required to accept and apply all relevant testimony.

The following laws to us seem applicable to this resolution, and the application of these laws in ruling out testimony or in accepting testimony:

1st.—Parliamentary usages, which reject all testimony foreign to the resolution.

2nd.—Any dissertation on religious matters outside of the resolution, or subject matter, not bearing on the question at issue in this resolution, should be rejected.

3rd.—Any personalities or abuse of personal presence or character,—reject.

4th.—Abuse of principles or views of creeds, or religious bodies, not involved in this resolution,—reject.

5th.—All hearsay, or testimony of a third party, not applicable, and by Mr. Braden's own ruling ruled out.

The following testimony seems to us to be admissible under Parliamentary usages:

1st.—Authentic history.

2nd.—Letters of persons above and beyond reproach.

3rd.—Statements of parties under oath, when taken before persons authorized by law to administer an oath.

4th.—The oral testimony brought before you in open session.

5th.—The written statement of any very remarkable occurrence that takes place before many persons, they agreeing with one accord in regard to the occurrence. All these witnesses are admissible in a discussion of principles.

We now proceed to review the testimony we have brought forward during this discussion.

1st.—The Bible, from which we have presented you all the leading phases of modern Spiritualism, such as seeing, hearing and being touched by spirits. Instance—Samuel seen by Saul and the woman of Endor.—1st Sam., 28th chapter.

2nd.—The historical statement of Josephus, corroborating Samuel, Saul and the woman.—Josephus' Book Antiquities.

3rd.—The testimony of Ezekiel that he saw Moses and Joshua and many other immortals, as well as how he was lifted up by a spirit.—Ezekiel, 11: 1, and in many other places.

4th.—The testimony of Daniel, who saw two saints by the side of the river; Ulais who saw the vision with Daniel.

5th.—The testimony of Jesus that John Baptist was Elias, in the gospels, also of Divos, Lazarus and Abraham.—Luke, 16 h.

6th.—The testimony of Peter, James and John that they saw Moses and Elias.—Matt., 10th.

7th.—The testimony of all the apostles that many were seen after the crucifixion that were dead.

8th.—The testimony of Peter in prison, of the physical phenomena, and of the angel that liberated him.—Acts, 12th.

9 h.—The testimony of Paul, Acts 9 h; 1st Cor., 12th, 13th and 14th chapters; also Acts, 23rd chapter.

10th.—The testimony of Timothy.—Heb. 13: 2.

11th.—The statement of John the divine, in 1st John, 4: 1, and in Rev. 1st, 19th and 22nd chapters, besides one thousand other proofs from the Bible.

We now call your attention to the second class of testimony produced by us during this discussion:

1st.—Josephus' "Antiquities"

2nd.—Robert Dale Owen's "Footfalls"

3rd.—A. J. Davis' works, and his letter of the 3rd inst.

4th.—Judge Edmonds and Professor Robert Hare's work.

5th.—The report of the sub-committee of the Society of Dialecticians of London, England, read in full by us on the evening of the 15th inst.

6th.—The testimony of the Wesleys.

All these are facts in evidence before our hearers. I now call your attention to the third class of testimony before us, and its direct bearing on the resolution under consideration.

1st.—The written statement of A. J. Davis, in which he states first, "I am a Spiritualist; second, I have seen and held conversation with persons who once lived on earth; third, I have at intervals in my life exercised the functions proper to several phases of mediumship; fourth, I know that death is not the end of my personal existence."

2nd.—The written statements and affidavits of Joseph Fotts, William Fotts, Andrew Fotts and W. Barr, M. D., and their affirmation that those things are true. Then comes the following, to compliment, "sworn and subscribed to before me this 3rd day of March, A. D., 1871. W. R. Verbeck, Mayor of Harrisburg, Pa.," with great seal of the city affixed.

3rd.—The sworn statement of Sylvester H. Todd, of Wisconsin, of spirit communion, that determines a law suit of six hundred dollars and costs, against one Reuben Walter, decided favorably, in the courts of Du Page and Kane Counties, Ill.

4th.—The letter and testimony of J. Antis, M. D., of Morris, Grundy County, Ill., proving a spirit picture taken by Ambrotype.

5th.—The written testimony of twelve living witnesses, of Crawfordsville, Ind., and of Richmond, Ind., concerning spirit photography, as taken by D. Wilkie, a member of the Christian Church at Crawfordsville, Ind., as well as the presentation of the pictures during the discussion.

6th.—The following statement of J. W. Fuller, superintendent of the public schools of Crawfordsville:

"I watched the artist closely while he was taking the inclosed picture, and know nothing about how the result was produced."

J. W. Fuller.

7th.—The written statement of Mrs. M. S. Skinner, of Savanna, Ohio, in regard to the Pottsboro bucket phenomena.

Our fourth class of testimony may be called the living witnesses in court.

1st.—Dr. Newcomer, David Eddy, Father Lawrence, all old and respected citizens of Cleveland, Ohio; we calling out each by name, and asking these questions:

"Are you a Spiritualist?"

"Yes."

"Have you ever seen, touched, or been touched by a spirit, once a human being?"

"Yes."

"Have you ever seen ponderable matter moved, in your presence, independent of contact with or through human physical help?"

"Yes."

"Did you see the spirits do these things, and do you know that these things are done by spirits?"

"Yes."

"Are you willing to affirm to these things on your oath here this evening?"

"Yes; we do."

Mr. Braden, do you wish to cross-examine these witnesses under oath? If so, you have the privilege. Will you take them in hand?

Mr. Braden.—I will attend to them by and by.

2nd.—My own testimony of seeing [illegible] as follows:

The doctor [illegible] brother. True to a letter. The loss of the steamer on Lake Ontario, and the saving of my life by spirit influence. The case of the unjust agent, who was found months afterwards, and compelled to make restitution of several hundred dollars. Of my being lifted into the air. Of my being moved in the chair by spirit influences, and we then offered to be sworn, and go under cross-examination, which Mr. Braden did not take advantage of. Hence, he has no right to reject or deny, but fully accept.

Our fifth class of testimony may be called the judgments in open court.

The Mumler trial, instituted by Mayor Hall, under the supervision of Marshal Toker before Justice Browning, in New York City. The charge was, obtaining money under false pretenses in taking pictures of the disembodied spirits of the dead. That one Mumler received various sums of money from sundry parties or persons at various times, through trickery, juggiery and deception.

The case came to trial with public opinion against Mumler. Detectives, artists, authors, editors and scientists, backed by the municipal authorities, were pitted against this one man, and during the trial, the following witnesses were called, and swore to the following facts:

1st.—Mr. Gilmore—Edmund Kirk, of Harper's Weekly, swore that he was detailed to work up the case against Mumler. Had done so. Had many pictures by Mumler, and that there was no fraud or trick with Mumler. That he had investigated the pictures of those who imitated Mumler, and detected them every time. That he was not a Spiritualist.

2nd.—Mr. Fenshaw, an artist of high reputation in New York City, testified that he got a picture of his mother, who had been dead twenty-eight years, and that the picture was fully recognized by several living members of the family, and that he was not a Spiritualist at the time the picture was taken.

3rd.—Mr. Livermore, one of New York's greatest bankers, swore positively to the picture of his wife, and that there was no collusion or trick in the case.

4th.—Mr. Silver, of Hudson or Poughkeepsie, sworn by Mumler came to his rooms, and with his material and instruments took pictures of the dead that were fully recognized, and that it was a reality. "I am a first-class artist—not a Spiritualist at the time those pictures were taken."

5th.—Judge Edmonds swore to the facts; the recognition, and reliability of spirit photography.

6th.—Professor O. E Varley, C. E., and electrician, as well as chemist, having charge of the Ocean Telegraph—not a Spiritualist—swore, first, to the fact that he had had spirit pictures taken of parties who died in England years ago, and who were never in America; second, stated that matter not visible to the naked eyes could be photographed, and that spirit photography was a fact.

7th.—Marshal Toker testified to having pictures taken—could not detect fraud, but believed it to be a fraud. His belief was ruled out.

I extract from Harper's Weekly and New York Herald.

The sixth class of witnesses we present you, may be called inferential, as well as positive.

The session on the part of writers and ministers of the Gospel that these things do take place and are a fact, but are evil, and their tendency is to evil, and that the spirits doing these things are the spirits of wicked dead men.

Thus we present you our classification of testimony introduced here during this discussion, on our part.

Mr. Braden, on the negative, has presented his testimony under the following heads or classifications:

1st.—He admits, first, that the sainted dead exist; second, that the wicked dead exist; third, that the sainted dead are not more occasional, manifested in the past, but that these were extraordinary occasions.

2nd.—That the demons and devils of the Old and New Testament were the spirits of wicked dead men.

3rd.—That the sainted dead and wicked dead continue to exist, but do not now communicate, or influence mankind.

4th.—He admits the phenomena of Spiritualism, "for I have seen the most, if not all of it," but denies our conclusion that it is the spirits of disembodied men, and affirms that it is the result of our own embodied spirits.

Mr. Braden accounts for the phenomena as follows:

1st.—Trickery, jaggiery, collusion and imposition.

2nd.—Hallucination, delusion and insanity.

3rd.—Unconscious muscular action—unconscious mental action through the nervous odil force.

4th.—That it is mesmerism, somnambulism and nervous odil or odic force.

5 h.—That it is the result of our own embodied spirit. Asking the question thirteen times, "Who shall limit the power of the spirit in the body? Are there any limits to the embodied spirit? Can we limit the power of the spirit in the body?"

6th.—Anderson and Blitz, and other magicians have duplicated all that the spiritual mediums have done. McQueen and others, once shining mediums, now declare that they were liars and cheats. Why not all liars and cheats? The insane and drunken men and women see spirits, call on spirits. Are not all seers, mediums and speakers insane?

We find quack medicines everywhere and false receipts of wondrous cures published by the volume. Are not all their healers quacks, cheats, humbugs and impostors?

The above candid statement covers the whole case, as told by Mr. Braden.

Now, let us look at his testimony—his witnesses. Who are they?

1st.—An insane man—his father in chains in prison—in the debtor's room, sees through a wall, and at the distance of thirty six miles sees his little daughter fall into the fire. This accounts for Spiritualism. What would a court of justice do with the testimony of a madman thirty-six miles from where the fact of the burning occurred. Mr. Braden has ruled it out.

On the other hand, we account for it on the spiritual proposition that his father was mediumistic, and that instead of the father being insane, he was passing through a spiritual development—for after he recovered, up to his death he possessed the power to foresee things. He never possessed before. Hence, his witness testifies for us, if for any one.

2nd.—McQueen & Co. are convicted liars, all of them impeached in courts of justice. Hence, their testimony is not admissible.

3rd.—Mesmerism, somnambulism, clairvoyance and odil force all testify on cross-examination.

We claim that we are acted by, and act under the directions of disembodied spirits, and are the links in the eternal chain of infinitism connecting man with angels. Again his witness testifies for our cause.

4th.—The unconscious mental and muscular actions all testify to the control of disembodied spirits.

5th.—Tricks of jugglers, of impostors, hallucinations, insanity, drunkenness, and revival meetings, are foreign to this discussion, and are outside of our resolution.

The phenomena occurring with the Jerkers, and their treeing the devil and barking at him when in the tree; the subjects of a Methodist camp meeting tracing Jesus and pulling him out of the tree; the tricks of Anderson and Blitz;—the confession of Giles the criminal—all are foreign to, and outside of this resolution.

To be Concluded.

(Concluded from first page.)

marked in life the persons by whose spirits these messages purport be sent. These communications generally claim that bad deeds in life are followed by suffering or loss in another world, and that in this life or the next there must be progress in moral improvement to secure happiness.

THE CREED OF SPIRITUALISTS.

The Spiritualists deny the orthodox opinion that death fixes for all eternity the final conditions of hundreds of millions of human beings. They believe that a man may after death in another world deeply repent his vices in this world, and become better. They don't believe that all transmigrations from spirits are any more reliable than all that is said by living men and women.

A TALK WITH A SPIRITUALIST.

The ideas of a believer in Spiritualism interviewed may be interesting [illegible] in it [illegible] Spiritual people. [illegible] at church. They deny R porter—"Do you claim that any text in the Bible favors Spiritualism?"

Spiritualist—"The Bible is full of recognitions of the fact that spirits exist separated and distinct from material bodies; that spirits can move inanimate matter, and can, under certain conditions not yet well understood, communicate intelligently with living human beings."

Reporter—"Will you refer me to where the Bible favors your system."

Spiritualist—"The Bible teaches that spirits have appeared to and talked with living human beings, as with Abraham, when overheard by Sarah, with Lot, with Hagar, with Isaac, with Balaam, with Saul and many others. It also tells how spirits took hold of Lot and his family, and carried off Elijah and took off Peter's chains, and carried him through the walls of the prison."

Reporter—"But were not the Israelites forbidden to have any dealings with familiar spirits—were not consulters with familiar spirits, wizards or necromancers to be driven out?"

Spiritualist.—That very law is an admission that there were spirits who were familiar—Moses denounced intercourse with those that advised the Israelites to worship idols. The spirits most readily and commonly communicating will be those latest from earth, and very little better than when they were in the body. Spirits whose acquaintances on earth have all long passed to the spirit land have few ties to earth, and if they come would have less power to convince living men and women that they are what they profess to be than spirits of those whose friends are still on earth in the body. In a bad age the spirit communications being oftenest from those who partook of the character of their age, and still have its traits, will be often evil. The ancient Israelites were low and beastial, and the tribes about them still more so, and Moses denounced intercourse with spirits as that favored idolatrous practices. Perhaps, in that age most spirits were for a long time after leaving the earth still low and depraved. The spirit of a man who lived in the past ages, even if it had progressed since in spirit land, being under widely different conditions from those that surround us, would have little sympathy for our ages—could not readily make us believe him to be what he represented himself, and his advice could not be of much advantage to us.

Reporter—"Are there not sometimes communications purporting to come from Moses and Solomon, Christ, and others mentioned in the Bible and who lived many years ago?"

Spiritualist—The fact that a communication purports to come from the spirit of Moses or any ancient saint don't prove that it does so. The apostle advised us to try the spirits. Let us consider the matter reasonably. There are possibly clergymen who are lascivious, mercenary, unjust and untruthful. If one such dies and, as we hold, begins a new period of probation and progression, is it reasonable to suppose that he would at once have his whole nature changed, and the traces of years of hypocrisy at once erased? Would he be likely at once to have his whole nature and habits changed, or would he be likely to only gradually become better? If he sent back a message it would probably be for some time somewhat like what he was in the body, and of course his communications should not be implicitly believed. It would be a hard thing for such an one from the spirit land to admit to all still living who loved and venerated him what his real character was. He would scarcely wish to send back a communication. If he sent one it might be equivocal, or false and wicked.

AN OLD LADY.

In conversation with one old lady, something was said of the position of the church of Spiritualism, when she remarked: "When I was a girl, at revivals in Methodist meetings, ministers, when urging persons to go up to the altar, very often proclaimed aloud to particular persons: "The spirit of your sainted mother, or the spirit of your departed father, is hovering over you, waiting to carry to heaven the news of your redemption; will you not give yourself to God, and thus let them bear the glad tidings?' but they have quit all that now, and if you went to twenty protracted meetings you would not hear it. They became afraid it was encouraging Spiritualism."

RECANTATION.

We made particular inquiry of many Spiritualists whether those who believed in Spiritualism recanted, and in every case we were assured that such instances were rare. Sometimes a person receiving communications from a low order of spirits got to thinking them of small advantage, just as a person might value the advice of living persons met in the street, and there might be cases of persons who would get to think the messages came from evil spirits, and thus by teaching things adverse to the gospel endangered souls, but no one who had seen the better sort of spiritual phenomena ever again doubted the existence of spirits, separate and apart from the body—ever again doubted the life of the soul apart from the body. He might even be led by sectarian arguments and orthodox theology to believe that the soul's fate was forever fixed when the body died, but such a case, if it ever occurred; was extremely rare, and there were a hundred instances of orthodox persons being made by the manifestations to believe in spiritual existence, and to regard spiritual communications as on the whole, good and beneficial to humanity, and to believe in the progress of all souls in spirit world for one who recants these opinions after once being led by what he has seen to believe them.

THE CHURCHES.

To meet the tide of Spiritualism, Evangelical Christians will have to organize for still greater efforts. The work in the home mission field will have to be vastly enlarged. The churches must feel that only by the most vigorous efforts can they check the advance. In one or two cases Spiritualism is making efforts to impress the rising generation. What it can do in that direction can hardly be over-estimated. It has several wide-spread, growing secret societies, which will give it such organization as it needs to become aggressive, which its want of common effort has hitherto hindered it from being.

WHAT THEY EXPECT.

Spiritualists expect that spirits whose voices are only now heard they say at rare intervals, and whose forms are only seen under unusual conditions, will at no distant day walk the earth and be seen and talked to by persons in daily ordinary life. They believe that in that time such will be the growth of Spiritualists that, men seeing the suffering and sorrow that sin entails will shrink from it, and righteousness and peace cover the earth as the water the great deep.

CONCLUSION.

There is no doubt that Spiritualists are as deeply in earnest, as positive in their convictions as any other class of persons. That they can not depend upon spirits as being uniformly truthful and reliable they frankly admit. They also admit that those who depend on the advice of spirits rather than their own judgments are likely to go far astray. But admitting that most spirits that can and do hold intercourse with human beings are, on the [illegible] little, and in

SPECIAL NOTICE.

SPEAKERS' AND MASS CONVENTION.

As Chairman of the Committee appointed by the Northwestern Speakers' Association, I am requested to call a Speakers' and Mass Convention, to be held at Smith's Opera House, Decatur, Illinois, on the 2d, 3d, and 4th days of June, 1871; to commence its first session on Friday, June 2d, at 10 o'clock A. M.; and to continue them for the three days as directed by the Convention.

This Association has commenced a series of meetings to gradually change the good social conventions that have found many good homes for worn, wearied, and sick mediums and speakers, to good social science conventions, to establish the rules by which all faithful workers in the cause of truth will receive a just support. Such progress is necessary, in this transition period of religious associations, from the theological to the scientific, free from the rule of the Christian priests of earth, licensed by man, to that of the angels of heaven, through mediums licensed by the laws of God.

This Convention is called to continue the progressive work of the Association, to establish the order and love of the angels in heaven, among the people of the earth.

Invitation is extended to all to be present. Those who attend will receive a cordial reception by the Spiritualists and their friends in Decatur.

Persons wishing special information about this entertainment of speakers and others, will address the Secretary of the Committee of Reception, H Righter, Box 296 Decatur, Ill.

By request of Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson, Moses Hull, D. W. Hull, Harvey A. Jones, Dr. Samuel Underhill, and Addie L. Ballou.

MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD,

Healing Medium,

Has been before the public as a successful Healer the past fifteen years. We rely entirely on the controlling influences. We diagnose and give prescriptions by letter. Distance no objection. We visit in person to a reasonable distance those that desire, and can afford the expense. Delineation and advice in a variety of ways. Emblems we give gratuitously to all our patients, when presented by our guides. Our former custom has been to come on request with the applicant by the hand-writing or lock of hair; but to save time, and the unpleasant sensation of taking on the symptoms of the disease, we require the applicant to give age and sex, with one or two leading symptoms of the disease, written by the patient, if able to write—if not, send lock of hair. As the giving of tests is not the object which we seek, but to restore the patient to health by Nature's own hand, in the shortest time possible, we do not deem it necessary here to lumber up an advertisement with what we have done or what we can do, but prefer to be known by our fruits.

Terms, for diagnosis and prescription, $2; Diagnosis without prescription, $1; all subsequent prescriptions, $1 each. All letters should be accompanied with the fee, and addressed to MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD, Box 45, Lake Mills, Jefferson Co., Wis.

LIBERAL TRACT SOCIETY.

Remarks of Prof. Wm. Denton and others, at the Second Hearing on the Incorporation of the "American Liberal Tract Society," before the Joint Committee on Parishes and Religious Societies, had at the State House, Boston, March 1st, 1871.

A brief account has already been given in this paper of the first hearing on the petition of "Wm. Denton and others" for a special act incorporating the "American Liberal Tract Society." The second in the series occurred as dated above. The Legislative Committee—composed of Messrs. Elliot (chairman) and Safford, of the Senate, and Everett, Flagg, Richardson, Lyford and Wheeler, of the House—being in their seats, and a considerable number of interested respondents being assembled, the object of the hearing was briefly stated by the Chairman, who announced the Committe as ready for business; also mentioning the fact that the object of the Society had been stated at a previous hearing.

Prof. Wm. Denton then arose, in response to the announcement, and said the matter had been brought before the Committee at a time when, from force of circumstance, he could not attend.

Chairman—Please state your name.

Prof. Denton—My name is William Denton.

Chairman—You may proceed sir.

Mr. Safford—I would request that the gentlemen, in their remarks, address themselves to the question as to why they do not organize under the General Statutes in these cases made and provided.

Denton—Under these provisions, we could not own real estate or possess funds over the amount of $100,000. But we expect that wealthy persons will be found who will increase our amount far above that, if we can only become organized, and thus appeal to the public confidence.

Safford—I wish to know if the Society has any funds at present in its keeping which it desires to put into real estate or otherwise invest.

Denton—There has not, up to the present time, been any effort to collect funds, other than for the publication and distribution of our tracts, of which we have already printed twelve, from which the public may judge of the character of our operations.

Chairman—If I understand the question, the Society wish to receive an act of incorporation which will permit them to hold a fund of $500,000.

Safford—They do not appear to have any funds at present, and the prospect of their obtaining $500,000 is very remote.

Denton—I would like to ask the gentlemen, if this Society had not been a Spiritualist or Liberal one—if it had been any other religious tract society—if the same objection would be urged. Would they be obliged to demonstrate the certainty of their obtaining their authorized capital, or the ways to be used in so obtaining it? I cannot perceive the justice in demanding this of us, and I object to it, unless it is applicable to all. Was it demanded in the formation of other tract societies?

Safford—I did not assist in the formation of any of them, and cannot tell.

Chairman—Has your Society any funds?

Denton—There is a certain amount in the hands of the Society, but how much I am unable to state. I have been engaged constantly for some time in lecturing, and unable to attend the meeting of the Society. There has been, in fact, but little effort made to collect funds, the matter being left till things could be reduced to working order. Up to the present time, the work has been of an individual character, as far as money-raising is concerned.

Chairman—Can any gentlemen present give us any idea of the condition of the Society's finances?

M. T. Dole—I think I can explain the matter, partially, at least. We do not attempt to collect and hold funds, but are using them for the printing and electrotyping of our publications, and are expending our money in these directions. We have felt it best to wait till we are a legally organized body, and then we shall have the means at hand by which we can go out into the field and make our collections. We desire to become such a legalized body before we ask for donations.

Chairman—Then I understand that there is no definite amount of funds in the hands of the Society.

Dole—No, sir; we cannot specify the amount at present.

Chairman—You may proceed, Prof. Denton, in giving us your views concerning this Society.

Denton—Our object in forming this Society is two-fold; it is, first, to break down what we believe to be false; and, second, to build up that which we believe to be true. Of course, there is some difference of opinion among the members of the Society, but I should go to work to prove the falsity of the commonly-received notion that the Bible is the Word of God; I should labor to destroy the wide-spread impression on the human mind that the Jehovah of the Jew is the Creator of the Universe, or that he in any relation to the God or Soul of that Universe; I should endeavor to show that Jehovah held the same position to the Jews that Jove did to the Romans, and that the one is just as much entitled to our worship as the other; that the Thunderer of Mount Sinai is no more worthy of our reverence than the Thunderer of Mount Olympus; I should labor to destroy the commonly-received notion that Jesus is the Savior of mankind—that he saves men in any other way than men save one another now.

Safford—That is, the tracts that you desire to publish are intended to advocate this?

Denton—That is what I should advocate in the tracts that I should write, and those would be among the subjects that I should aim to reach; and I think the society generally has a similar view of the matter. We should do what we could to destroy the common notion that man is ever to be placed in a position in another world where he cannot progress and work himself free from error, whether of conduct or education.

Safford—Will you repeat what you have said concerning Christ?

Denton—I said I should work to prove that he was not the Savior of mankind in any other sense than men save each other now.

Chairman—With regard to the Bible? I do not know that I got a clear understanding of what you said.

Denton—I said I should endeavor to prove that the Bible is not the Word of God any more than any other book of a similar character. We should receive it into our credence just as any other book, in proportion to the amount of truth that we believe it to contain, and the morality it teaches:—no more. We regard God as having nothing more to do with the writing of the Bible—either by his direct interposition, or by his command to certain chosen servants—than he has with the writing of our common newspapers.

Chairman—And that Jesus Christ was not inspired? Do you claim that?

Denton—No more than Socrates;—no more than any other man who is inspired with a great truth, and desires to make it known to his fellows.

Chairman—And what about Jehovah?

Denton—That he is not the God of the Universe, or any relation to him; that he is like the Jove of the Romans, and is equally to be discarded when men become sufficiently enlightened to see the inconsistencies of his character.

Safford—Do you consider the Old Testament to be a myth, or a fable?

Denton—No; I do not take that ground.

Safford—Do you consider it to have been of a mythical origin?

Denton—Parts of it. That it has any miraculous basis, I do not believe. Most marvelous stories have some little foundation in fact, or they would not have been received at the outset.

Safford—What is your opinion with regard to the revelations of Deity in the Old Testament?

Denton—I think their influence upon men is very bad. I think it is very injurious to the reason of man to tell him the story of a God angry and changeable, who puts his children in the way of what they could not from their ignorance escape, and then curses their descendants through all time because of their mistake;—a being who destroys all men from the face of the earth except eight persons, although he had previously, upon full fiction, declared them, as his work, to be good. I think such stories are bad for men; they are injured by the worship of such a God;—they obtain an idea of a being full of wrath and vengeance, whose worship cannot fail to be mischievous.

Safford—What is your idea of God? Do you believe there is any?

Denton—I think there is a soul to the universe, just as there is to man.

Chairman—You think there is a soul?

Denton—Yes, as I use the term soul. I use the term God as I use the term man. I mean by it, either the whole man, spirit and body, or I mean his spirit, which is the true man; so by God I mean the entire universe, all that is, or the spirit of the universe;—that unseen Force that manifests itself in the universe; as Paul speaks of God as "all and in all." In that sense I accept the term God.

Safford—Do you mean by this God a personal Deity?

Denton—No. Person to me implies shape; the Infinite can have no shape.

Safford—Do you believe in a God of will?

Denton—All the will in the universe belongs to God?

Richardson—Does not the will of man belong to God?

Denton—Yes; intelligence is only the result of that ocean of intelligence lying back of it.

Safford—Intelligence in the material universe, you mean?

Denton—Yes; I so believe.

Chairman—Do I understand you to say that God is everything, and that everything is God?

Denton—Yes; but that everything includes a great deal, of course, of which we can know nothing.

Richardson—Do you believe there is such a thing as sin?

Denton—Yes.

Chairman—What do you call sin?

Denton—The known violation of natural moral law.

Richardson—Do you believe that God is holy and perfect?

Denton—Yes; if the universe is perfect God is perfect—not otherwise.

Safford—Is there any being to whom prayer should be addressed?

Denton—None to whom it would be of any avail.

Safford—None superior to man?

Denton—I consider that spirits may be superior to man; but I do not believe there is a power in the Universe to which we may appeal, and by our appeals suspend any law of Nature, because that law is the life of God, and the violation of one of his laws would bring destruction to the universe.

Safford—Do you consider anything as profanity which may be used with regard to God?

Denton—I would not use the words which are generally considered profane, because of their vulgarity; I would not do so, because it tends to injure the feelings of others; but I do not think it any worse, in a moral sense, to use the term God than to say Jove or Jupiter.

Safford—You only object, then, to its use, because of other people?

Denton—Yes; just as I would abstain from using other vulgar words.

Safford—But do you not think that the use of vulgar words brings injury to the person using them, also, because of the associations they call up?

Denton—Yes.

Safford—You say you consider the use of profane words injurious; though not in the sense which is generally attached to it. Why do you think their use would prove injurious?

Denton—Because they injure the feelings of others without bringing any counterbalancing good.

Richardson—Then you do not believe they do you any wrong at all?

Denton—They may injure me if they affect my sense of right; but I do not believe they will bring upon me the wrath of the God of the universe.

Richardson—You admit that there is sin—say murder for instance—in the world. Why should not this be right? Man, being God, or part of him, should certainly do right.

Denton—The existence of all these evils—murder among the rest—is owing to the undeveloped state of the earth; our world is not perfect; what exists is the best that can be, and changes for the better, I think, are always going on. The apple tree, imperfect because not fully matured, or by reason of other circumstances, may not be able to give forth perfected fruit, but time may remove the disqualifications.

Richardson—Do you think God is chance?

Denton—I do not believe in chance; no such thing is to be found in the universe.

Chairman—You believe in law?

Denton—Yes.

Richardson—Do you believe that God is perfect.

Denton—I have already replied that God, to me, is perfect if the universe is so. Man is here as the result of all that has preceded him; his sins are only the outgrowth of his imperfections, and his perfection, as man, is destined to be reached in coming time. I think the world is gradually growing better—that it is better now than in the past, and will be vastly better in the future.

Richardson—Do you believe these men are Gods?

Denton—They are parts of God, certainly.

Richardson—Do you believe that God is holy?

Denton—If the gentleman will tell me what he means by holy, I will answer him.

Chairman—Do you believe that there is a center or seat of perfection anywhere?

Denton—I think it is here as much as anywhere. I think God is just as much here as in any part of the universe.

Richardson—In our perfection?

Chairman—It is certain that it is not here. You do not believe in perfection?

Denton—Not in the sense in which you speak, but just as I said of the apple tree and its fruit. It is perfect in a sense, though its fruit may improve. I believe in the possibility of perfection through growth.

Richardson—Do I understand you to say that God is developed—that Infinity is developed?

Denton—Just as much as the universe is, I say. There are plenty of changes for the better going on all the time, and there are still many men and women—as well as fruit trees—that are in need of development.

Richardson—Do you make a distinction between mind and matter?

Denton—Yes.

Richardson—Do you think that the human soul is able to exercise perfect volition?

Denton—I cannot define how far man's will is free; it is to me an open question.

Richardson—What would you say to the remark of Hamilton: "To think God is as you think him to be, is blasphemy?"

Denton—I don't know how you are going to help yourself. Just as much as you can comprehend of God you receive and recognize, and that is the basis of your judgement.

Safford—What do you think of the motto engraved on some of our coin, "In God we trust."

Denton—Do you think they speak the truth when they say "In God we trust?" I don't think they believe it at all. When a war breaks out, they trust in their soldiers.

Safford—Does it not seem like an effort to acknowledge God in the affairs of the nation?

Denton—I look at it as an individual act. I should like to see the person who suggested it, or the person who authorized its being placed on the coin—it was a private affair entirely.

Richardson—Do you believe that any remark made by Plato or Socrates has any force whatever?

Denton—Yes—just as much as the truth contained in it.

Richardson—Who is to decide?

Denton—Every man for himself.

Richardson—And there is no other authority?

Denton—No—not to my mind.

Safford—I will read Article Second of the Bill of Rights, State of Massachusetts: "It is the right as well as the duty of all men, publicly and at stated seasons, to worship the Supreme Being, the Great Creator of the universe." What is your opinion concerning this?

Denton—Please read that again. [It was read.] For those who believe it right to worship God, there should be the utmost freedom of worship, granted as to the mode of it; but for those who do not believe in such worship, it certainly can not be their duty to perform it. I do not believe in it. It is not a duty for any man to do what is contrary to his reason.

George A. Bacon—We desire to know if it is not the duty of all men to worship the Supreme Being at all times, and not at certain stated seasons.

Safford—The article refers to public worship.

Bacon—But the question grows out of it.

Safford—I suppose so.

Richardson—Give us some idea of what you propose to teach in place of what you would take away. Tell us what you propose to substitute when you have removed the present system, I'm all afloat. You know Hume's mother accepted his ideas during her life; but when she came to die, she asked him to give her something to sustain her in her parting hour. If you throw out all these things, what have you to offer?

Denton—First of all, I would distribute tracts devoted to the laws of health and their correct observance.

Richardson—We have such treatises already. We want your religion."

Denton—I regard that as a part of true religion—that men should be instructed as to the laws of health and their correct observance. I should take a portion of the time that is now devoted to religious services, and devote it to this special subject, teaching men that absolute obedience to the laws of Nature is the best preparation for the life hereafter. I would then give them the light we have concerning a future life, and the glory growing out of our recognition of that life, and show them that life, as conducted by them here, influences the life hereafter.

Richardson—But we have all this now.

Denton—Far different, sir; for men are told that they can live ninety years in crime and moral degradation, and then repent at the last moment and be saved. I think such teachings, given by Orthodoxy, have a very bad effect upon the minds of the people. I should teach that men make themselves in the future state just what they are, and that their acts here are sure to influence them in all coming time.

Bacon—We believe that "as a man soweth, so shall he also reap."

Denton—Yes.

Richardson—Do you believe that a drunkard can reform.

Denton—Yes; but the consequences of his deeds will cling to him. He can never be the same man he would have been if he had not contracted the habit.

Richardson—Why?

Denton—Because his body will be affected by it, and as far as mind is concerned, he can not attain to what he would have been had he lived in accordance with natural law.

Richardson—I would like to ask a gentleman who is here, who has had the experience to which I refer, and has reformed, if he thinks he has not escaped from the evil results of his former life, and if he has not gained some knowledge by the experience?

Denton—Some one says you can learn something by diving into a mud-puddle that you could not otherwise learn; but I don't think it wise to attempt the experiment for so small a return.

Richardson—But would you not say that he was really a changed man? Do you think that the results of his drinking in the past remain in full force now?

Denton—I think, if the gentleman is honest, and will tell us the truth in the matter, he will acknowledge that he is not as well, in mind or body, as if he had not had the experience.

Richardson—Then you believe, sir, that God, and no other being, can pardon sin?

Denton—I do not think there is any pardon for sin possible.

Safford—Do you make a distinction between moral and physical laws?

Denton—Yes.

Safford—Where is the authority of the physical laws obtained?

Denton—From the laws of Nature.

Safford—Now, if that is the origin of physical laws, they are the operations of Nature under certain circumstances?

Denton—Yes

Safford—Well, now, what is the origin of moral law?—that it is wrong to steal, for instance?

Denton—I think it runs with Nature also. If any action does injury to us, either in body or mind, it is wrong. If stealing should be found as generally productive of good to us and our fellows, as it is now of evil, it would be naturally considered as right.

Safford—Has man a conscience that tells him what is right?

Denton—I do not believe in conscience as you use the term. It is simply a voice saying "Do right." The judgment decides what is right; and that depends on education entirely.

Safford—You say that you come to the conclusion that moral laws are founded on experience, and that stealing is wrong because it exerts an injurious effect upon society; but if it had a good effect, it would not be wrong. Now, how did men find that it was wrong?

Denton—By studying its effects upon society from age to age.

Dr. H. B. Storer—Do you believe in transmitted influences?

Denton—That comes under the head of instinct. I think the question hinges upon our experience concerning all things around us.

Safford—Then stealing is not essentially wrong, but only inexpedient?

Denton—It is wrong because it is inexpedient—because it is contrary to human well being.

Safford—Is there any conscience that restrains men from committing murder?

Denton—The judgment of man has decided that murder is wrong, and in consequence, doubtless, of its evil effects.

Safford—Then there is nothing but education which keeps one man from murdering another?

Denton—You are mistaken; because persons generally were born possessed of reason, and, as they attained to years of discretion, they saw the effect that this killing would have upon society. Suppose, for instance, you were disposed to remove one person from your way. You reflect that some other one might desire to remove you, and the fact that your life is thereby in danger would deter you, and make you feel that your contemplated deed was not right. Of course, in time, men united to make laws; and, among the ancient Egyptians, thousands of years before the Bible was written, they had the commandments: "Thou shalt not steal." "Thou shalt not kill," "Thou shalt not bear false witness," or lie; because they were the outgrowth of their reason. I believe that they came as the result of the development of the human mind through long ages.

Safford—Is there any Creating Power outside of Nature?

Denton—No, sir, not outside of the universe. How can there be?

Safford—How about the adaption of means to ends, and other traces of a guiding and forming power?

Denton—I believe all is in the universe; outside of it there can be nothing.

Safford—Well; you will endeavor in the tracts you are to distribute to make these views known?

Denton—As far as I can. My friends will do the same. Of course they may have different opinions, and it is our purpose to allow the broadest freedom of expression.

Safford—Now I would ask if you, considering your position in society, would take these funds and publish these tracts?

Dole—There is a Committee on Publication appointed by the Society, and all our tracts must receive their approval—or that of a majority—before they are published. Prof. Denton's or any other man's tracts must be subjected to their action; if accepted, they would be published; if rejected, they would not be.

Chairman—I would like to know if this combination of twelve tracts [holding them up to view] was published under the endorsement and by the permission of the Society?

Denton—Yes.

Chairman—Then they are the sentiments of the Society, as maturely deliberated upon and given to the public?

H. S. Williams—As a member of the Society, I would say that, in the publication of these tracts, the greatest latitude is allowed for the expression of individual opinions; so that they do not convey always the sentiment of the whole Society on different subjects. For instance, I may have ideas exactly opposite to those set forth in a tract, but still be willing to publish it, knowing that if it is true it will hold its own, and if not it will certainly fall.

Dr. H. F. Gardner—If a tract is published by us, it is no proof that it is the sentiment of all the rest of the Society, because we aim to bestow as much freedom as possible in the expressions of individual views. Some may differ very materially from the views of others. I have a tract in my pocket that I should not publish, or vote for publishing. It has been printed by another society that is called Orthodox. Mr. Denton does not bind me with regard to my opinions, neither does my opinion bend him. We claim the right to give our thoughts to the world as freely as those who are diametrically opposed to us; and that is why we asked for a hearing.

Chairman—I do not object to a further hearing, but if you have here [pointing to the tracts] all that you would express—in print—we can base our opinions on them.

John Wetherbee—As a member of the Society, holding different views from him, I have no doubt that I should not a construction on our intentions different from Professor Denton. I should not belong to this Society if it was constituted only to promulgate knowledge concerning the laws of health, for I do not think that this would satisfy me or do me good. I think that the Liberal Tract Society is founded to act upon the religious part of man's nature, bringing light to those who are in darkness, because of want of proof concerning the future state, or because of education concerning their condition hereafter. In no way can I better explain myself than by giving to the gentleman of the committee a brief sketch of my experience.

I have been very many years an Infidel—"without God or hope in the world." I have had a religious education; but when I was an Infidel I think I was a better man, because I was open and honest in my life and statements, and void of hypocrisy. I know that my friends—the so-called dead—are present, and have communicated to me, telling me of the world where they dwell. And I would like to give this knowledge to others; I would bring to them the cheering assurances which I have received—which have brought to me that calm and satisfied state of mind, that I would as readily pass out of this world as out of yonder door, if it was my time to go in the order of Nature. I recognize also the laws of health, and the necessity of their promulgation, but they are too cold for me to make a specialty of. I look to the life ahead, and to the necessity of more fully propagating our ideas concerning it; and when my friend of the committee asked what consolation we had to offer if we took away the ancient order of things, saying he was "all afloat" as to our ideas, I was impelled to speak of what I have received.

I received, as I said, a religious education; Rev. Dr. Sharp was an intimate friend. But after I became an Infidel I lost a little child, and a minister was sent to my house, (I will give his name—Rev. Mr. Stockbridge) to render to the family the consolations of his religion; and he came, talking to my wife of the mysterious ways of Providence that were past finding out; of the other world, and the life hereafter; and his views were so different from hers that she said to me:

"Oh, take him away! he is horrid!"

But after awhile we received the light of Spiritualism, and the darkness rolled away from our souls. We have those among us who like to

THE ALLY.

By Mrs. Ottilie Bertron.

The fancies of the world change, and customs, after deteriorating, go out of use. There was a time, however, with some nations, when "the fair" was an event, an amazing sight, and an oral perplexity.

Rows of booths, forming a village within the town, displayed oriental luxuries and elegant jewelry, side by side with the fancy trifles of, "three cents apiece." Millinery smiled on iron kettles and farming-tools. Book-shelves locked proudly down upon the shoe-store, and artificial flowers rivalled nature's fragrant beauties.

The fair and the brave, the old and the young, were alike pushing their way as best they could through the heaving crowd of human beings all adding their mite to a din and confusion unparalled in the annals of peace.

Suspended curtains and rags floating in the breeze, revealed monstrous reptiles, and tropical anima's of the fiercer kind, to inform the multitude below of the presence of their originals. At some distance, clad in the white of the snow and the blue of the sky, the rope-dancer's pose little orphan was seen in the act of performing her perilous walk upon a rope suspended from the highest steeple and fastened at the other end to the ground with a stake.

Still farther off, the "English riders" were wending their way through the streets of the city, on an invitation tour, and the scattered sounds from the instruments of their band, blended with the noise. At some of the corners of the town streets, organ-grinders, old and young, were posted, turning their organs and dancing dolls for the pennies of some wondering and delighted children, while at others the fashionis taates were shocked by the shrill, nasal voices of women, who, dressed in fanciful rags, were singing vulgar songs or romantic ballads, not unfrequently accompanied by the fiddle or guitar performance of one of the numerous labor-shunning lords of creation.

The Savoyard was there with his scarlet-robed monkey. The boys were there, too, with their pop-guns, drums and fifes, and it was utterly impossible for those who attended this thoroughfare, distinctly to understand their own words or those of their companions.

The difficulty of understanding precisely the words of others as well as our own is not confined to thorcughfares. It is a phenomena of the intellectual world quite as much as of the world of traffic, and has frequently been a prolific cause of controversy. Owing to this fact, the words "matter" and "mind," for instance, have, in all ages been the subjects of innumerable, often self-conflicting speculative theories, and it can hardly be denied that the vast amount of skepticism concerning the existence and immortality of the soul, which characterizes the present age, is derived from, and sustained by, the same circumstance,—the want of a thorough analyzation of the terms employed.

Words, it has been said, express ideas, and the following paragraph furnishes a concise and comprehensive explanation of the ideas vested in the word "matter."

"The properties of matter are five. 1st, The particles of matter are solid, and occupy space. 2nd, They are infinitely divisible. 3rd, They are impenetrable. 4 h, They possess immobility, but are inert. 5.h, They universally attract and are attracted."

Since matter is "the substance of which all things are composed," the human, as well as the animal body, is composed of it. Light and electricity are matter, though matter in a very refined condition.

If nervous power is, as has been suggested, a modification of the same original force, the three together may produce life, and life, mere animal life, may be the result of matter, and animals are properly considered a material mechanism.

Materialists assert man also is nothing more than a material mechanism, but superior in construction. Carrying out this theory, it is the mere animal, but somewhat superior mechanism, which enables man to build better houses than the beaver, to weave a more beautiful net than the spider, to swim rivers and seas by the aid of other means than fins; in short, this material animal mechanism enables him to execute, instinctively, mechanical works so grand and remarkable in the vastness of their progressive magnitude, that he presumes to forget his brother buffalo, and ventures to extend his enterprises from the prairies of North America to the Arabian deserts, and from the icy bulwarks of the Arctic ocean, over equatorial zones to Antarctic solitudes.

If materialists could prove that man battles with the elements, and rules upon the earth by nothing more than a superior mechanical animal mechanism, other objections to their theory would still be unremoved.

Man is capable of the exercise of volition in direct opposition to instinct. A locomotive, although moving at the impulse of steam, which is its life, needs a directing-engineer. In the mechanism of the human being, the will is that directing engineer. The animal mechanism is destitute of it. Man can easily tame and domesticate many animals, and by his determinate perseverance subject all to himself by means of their instincts, for animals have no will. They are not capable of action opposed to their instincts, and they are governed by that instinct which is at the moment of action the predominating one. Mere animal mechanism, therefore, is not progressive. Material'sts vaunt the wisdom of the elephant, the language of the parrot, the generosity of the lion, and the faithfulness of the dog. Much, however, of the praise which these animals receive is due to the eulogies of admiring and credulous owners, who can see in their pets what no one else can see, and to the exaggerated accounts of writers of fiction and of travel, who added to the charm of their narratives by permitting their imagination to transcend facts. Neither the animals alluded to, nor any other, have advanced from the state in which they were created. The parrot has not increased his store of words, for the want of ideas. The elephant's superior wisdom has wrought no change in his condition and pursuits. The lion still devours until satiated whatever suits his taste, unless he is conquered or restrained by fear. The dog is still a docile creature of abject fear, but endowed with instinct sufficient for the friends who feed him—an attraction which is probably produced by the universal attraction of matter. It is nothing more.

Animals do not rise above their instincts. Man alone has an intelligent will upon which is based that progress of which the human race has shown itself capable. The abilities to imbibe, to reason, and to exercise volition in conformity to thought and reason, and in opposition to instinct, proceed from something which exists not in animals. This something can not be matter, because it can not be classed with any of the ideas vested in the word "matter." Invisible, intangible, it can not be analyzed by the senses. This something which is, but is not matter, has from time immemorial been called "mind," "spirit," "soul," "intellect."

Aristotle is the author of the theory of different powers of the soul, of distinct reasoning, feeling, moving, willing powers or faculties.

Kant divides the human mind into the three functions of sense, understanding, and reason. Others designate observation, discrimination, feeling, or sentiment and imagination, the attiuents through which the mind receives its impressions.

It does not matter in how many different facultics the devisers of systems may divide the soul to simplify "mental science,"—all distinguished metaphysicians in speaking of the mind as the immaterial power which distinguishes man from the beast, use the terms applied to it as one whole, interchangeably.

Locke speaks of the mind as of the understanding, meaning one and the same thing. Cousin calls the spiritual element in man "reason," and by "absolute reason" means the original Source or the Deity himself. Hegel calls it "mind" and "spirit."

Whatever we know about our own minds, we derive from two sources,—from our own reflections and from the thoughts and reflections of others, impressed upon our minds by means of visible or audible words, and from both combined. We are indebted to science for much valuable information which imparts to us, to a great extent, the laws by which the physical universe is governed, and we may safely infer from these, that similar principles are in operation in the mental world. This analogy teaches the immortality of the soul. If matter is indestructible, mind must be equally so. That can not be destroyed, must continue to exist in some manner. The soul, therefore, must continue to exist or be immortal, whether man choses to believe it or not.

Transmigrationists may be right when they believe that their departed friends are skipping about in the shape of frogs, or bid them welcome with the flabby wings of bats. The bodies of their friends, their physical lives, being matter, may have been recomposed and reanimated in these combinations, but the frogs and bats are all matter. The invisible, intangible something, which spoke from the lips of their friends, concerning ideas, is not there.

In the material creation, nothing is self-existent or capable of isolated, independent action. Combination of existence and reciprocity of action are universal. Similar laws govern the mental world, and the soul is no isolated independent existence, but a part of an infinite mental creation.

As matter is not confined to this little earth, so the soul is not confined to it. It is not restricted to the body, but lives in connection with other portions of the spiritual universe, and is subject to a reciprocity of action similar to that which governs matter.

Opposing forces are manifest in the physical universe, and the opposing elements of good and evil actuate the mental world.

Not very long ago, a gallant people were waging a war of self-defense. They fought bravely, endured heroically, shed their life-blood freely, but in vain. They had no ally, and were conquered. The victorious enemy of that gallant people had an ally upon the invaded territory, and conquered!

Life is not unlike that great contest; it is a strife—a struggle. Matter and mind are in combat arrayed. Matter has an ally and must conquer in the struggle unless mind also seek its ally, and cultivate the alliance.

One genial day in the spring, when the world looked bright, and flowers festered by vernal showers had found their way to the city market and the city home, a gentleman was walking the street in a mood less pleasant than the hour. He was intelligent, a politician, a public man of position. He was kind-hearted, attached to his wife and children, and might have been happy,—but an enemy had insulted, injured, provoked him, and he was irritated. On his way home he stopped at the bar to refresh himself. His purse, like many others, had grown light years ago, but that was no reason why he should deny himself a gentlemanly treat. He was generous, and asked some friends to partake with him. They were courteous and appreciative, and he enjoyed their liberality. Soon after, he met his enemy, and as the sun was verging towards its meridian, and the brandy was rising to his head, his blood began to boil. An altercation ensued. His self-confident mind sought not its ally, and grew dim. His enemy was provoking, though not disposed to extend a blow. This increased his humanity, and his self-reliance. His passions rose, matter conquered, and panting for the blood of his enemy, he rushed on till a vanquished foe lay lifeless at his feet, and he returned home, his hands dripping with human blood! What a pity no ally whispered "Revenge is mine."

Mind's ally is not a vision of the night, not a phantom of the imagination, nor a "wrapping" spirit. Mind's ally does not speak in the mysterious voice heard by the lunatic or the impostor. The truth is that ally! The supercilious intellect of all ages has asked, and still asks, with a sneer, "What is the truth?"

"Correct opinion" is a tree of many branches. Its loftiest boughs are those moral truths which emanating from the same great fountain whence the soul had its origin, are embodied in that spirit which ought to be mind's ally. This truth, anterior to the human race, is also co-existent with it. The communications of this ally have been preserved in the world, and still are imparted to many by means of the reciprocity of the actions of our own minds, with outside impressions. The latter always have been, and still are, preserved in one of two ways, namely: by the word from the lip, or by autograph or print. Progress marks the step of the truth.

The truth is nothing new; it has always been in the world, though not always visible. The laws which have said, and do say, murder is a crime, theft to be punished, bear witness to it. The idolater who worships the ox made with his own hands, depraved though he be, attests it. His mind seeks to ally itself to something congenial, but lacking the necessary outside impressions, fastens itself upon the ox.

The natural mind, destitute of the spirit ally, is absolutely incapable of attaining to any correct moral ideas. It needs outside impressions for its own development. Man is a dual being of matter and mind, and the means for his employment of himself in both capacities, have been provided by the creator of both.

ASTROLOGY.

Reply to "Scientist."

BY PROF. W. H. CHANEY.

"Scientist" assures us that he "has had a life long experience in mathematical, astronomical and philosophical research, * * * from its simplest phenomena to the most abstruse deductions of the higher analysis in the field of physics." This assurance implies that he has great confidence in his own knowledge and acquirements. Well, so had I in mine at twenty, but after thirty years more of study and reflection, I have learned to distrust myself on almost every point; therefore, when "Scientist" expresses his lack of faith in my "scientific attainments," he but echoes my own misgivings.

"Scientist" informs the reader of the Journal, "that any and all numerical calculations in which they (logarithms) are appropriately used, can be made either with or without them." Now I would willingly walk a hundred miles to be convinced that this is true in mathematics. That there may be no room for cavilling, I will give a problem for solution, without the use of logarithms.

The radical place of the sun is 15 degrees and 46 minutes in the sign Taurus; that of Mars is 4 degrees and 12 minutes in the sign Virgo. Required the arc when the sun shall have moved to a quartile of the radix of Mars, by primary direction?

The general reader will hardly comprehend this problem, but it must be plain to one familiar with "the most abtruse deductions of the higher analysis in the field of physics," and for the sake of science, I trust he will furnish the Journal with a solution in which logarithms shall not be employed.

If I do not misunderstand "Scientist," and he does not misunderstand himself, I will travel a thousand miles to obtain a personal interview, for I should then see a sage such as I cannot find described in all the history of the past, namely, one who has learned the science of astrology (for I presume by his assurances that he has,) and then pronounced it a humbug. Many learned Englishmen have commenced its study in order that they might the more understandingly refute it, but in every instance became converts. It was precisely in this manner that I came to believe in astrology. I commenced writing a work for publication designed to expose the impostures of "fortune telling." Having completed some twenty pages of Mss. by way of introduction, and intending to place Astrology at the head of the list, I found myself greatly at loss for terms, and how to handle my subject. In this dilemma I applied to a practicing astrologer in New York city, to teach me the science, concealing from him the motive which induced me to learn it. His terms were five dollars per lesson, of one hour each. This exorbitant price, with the assurance that I should require at least one hundred lessons to become proficient, at first discouraged me; but I made an arrangement to write for him, and was installed in his office and house as one of the family, where I remained seven months. At first I was a hypocrite, playing the spy whenever he delineated a nativity. Besides, I acted as amanuensis for him when written nativities were ordered. It was this experience which made me an astrologer against my will and inclination. Now if "Scientist" has learned how to dispose what I have been compelled to accept as facts, I will gladly become his pupil, for truth, no matter where it may land me, is my highest aim.

Astrology, as I now understand it, is founded purely in the principles of induction. Bacon (a devoted astrologer) disproved the philosophy of Aristotle, and taught us that the only sound method of reasoning was to prove the premises instead of assuming them. With him, reasoning a priori to demolish the inductive philosophy, was as futile as blowing against the wind. In my ignorance I have accepted Bacon and "inductions." The opponents of Spiritualism invariably reason a priori, but the Spiritualist addresses to the Baconian philosophy. Dick reasoned against astrology a priori, and the misuse of terms betrays his entire ignorance of the science, yet he was a great astronomer and a very learned man. He assumed that astrology was false, and has proved it false, to the entire satisfaction of all who can be satisfied short of induction. But his logic does not weigh as much as a feather in the mind of one who has observed the influence of a transit of Saturn on the mid-heaven of a horoscope, as I have in hundreds of cases. As well might a blind man argue that there was no distinction of color, to one who has eyesight. Equally well may the clergy argue that there is no such a thing as spiritual phenomena; but those who have witnessed it, will not heed their logic. A million of persons testifying that they do not know a fact, weighs nothing against the positive evidence of one truthful witness who swears that he does know the fact.

But if I understand "Scientist" correctly, he has not placed himself in the illogical position of denouncing astrology as a "humbug" upon a priori grounds. He has learned the science among the most abtruse deductions of the higher analysis in the field of physics," and with an acumen transcending the mighty genius of a Bacon, a Kepler and a Newton, discovered that the planets have no mundane influence. Now if this is true, (and I will not deny it, for I make it a rule never to deny what another assures me to be true, provided I am ignorant of certain facts known to him,) then I am anxious to learn of "Scientist," whose very nom de plume inspires me with reverential awe. He says he desires no controversy with me. Very well, we will have none, save that gentlemanly controversy which naturally arises between teacher and pupil, provoked by a desire on the part of the latter to clearly understand the subject.

In conclusion I must express my regrets that the society of Spiritualists in Chicago, have not availed themselves of my offer to give them a test of the science, for now I am on the point of resuming my travels, and it will likely be several months before I am settled again. But I will keep Brother Jones advised of points where I may be reached by letter from time to time, holding myself in readiness at all times to respond to any challenge which calls in question the truth of the celestial science. I shall return to my family in New York city some time in the course of a year, and will lecture on astrology in Chicago, when I will invite the severest criticism. I shall also be happy to submit myself to "Scientist," either personally, by private letter, through the press, orally before the public, for any test or discussion he may elect. I shall leave here early in April for Walla Walla, W. T.; thence to Portland, Oregon; lecture there and in the vicinity for a time; thence to San Francisco; make the tour of California, and return home.

PARALLELS.

By J. Tinney.

Galileo wishes the world to believe that he has made a discovery, and seems bent on revolutionizing the whole philosophical system of our times by attempting to trample under foot the very axioms of Modern Science, etc. To the truly wise such vanity is detestable.—Ancient Professors.

This Westfield dimpleton wishes the world to believe that he has made a discovery! The reciprocal relations of spirit and matter in opposition to the very axioms on which modern science is based, the aristocracy of one over the other. Such Vanity, &c.—Modern Solons.

Whatever may be thought of my theory none will fail to discover the parallel. Nearly fifteen years have elapsed since we ventured the assertion that whoever shall solve the problem of existence will do it on the principle that all worlds and systems of worlds from those in embryo to those trembling with age, derive their origin from the boundless ocean of elementary male and female forces in which they exist, that so-called spirit and material world, like the male and female in their outgrowths, are the two halves of one whole, sexual in their relations, each equally necessary to the existence of the other, balancing each other by interchange, each taking the place of the other and becoming what the other was. That the same laws of production and reproduction by which all organic forms are produced in their outgrowths, are equally applicable to worlds themselves. That the family of Planets that revolve around our sun, are the offsprings of that luminary in the successive order in which they appear, the moon a child of the earth and consequently a grand-child of the sun. That all worlds and system of worlds are subject to the same laws and derived from the same source, and revolving in one eternal round of ever-changing conditions from which no part is exempt. The idea was treated as the effect of a diseased imagination and unworthy a moment's notice. To-day the application of the reproductive idea to worlds, is endorsed by some learned professors on both sides the river. To illustrate our position we have only to draw a parallel between a solar and a human family as one is only a representation or continuation of the other, the laws of production and reproduction being universal in their application. Our government is based (not administered for that is impossible under belief in Supreme Power) on the same organic laws by which we exist as individuals. The millions of peoples which constitute our nation, is the elementary ocean from which all the forms and powers of government are derived. None will dispute this. When formules are allowed their rights there is no supremacy in this elementary ocean, all are equals. The Philosophy that makes fathers superior to mothers, whether called Father God and Mother Nature or by any other name, finds no response in the soul, and never yet found production of harmonious relation. If the fathers of this plane of existence were not the mothers of a preceding one, all nature is a lie, each change of plane producing a change of sex. The idea of unchangeable germ centres is the cause of consequences too horrible for us to portray. If the Spiritual Philosophy is based on correct principles, twenty-three years should have united its advocates in one harmonious brotherhood instead of wrangling over organization, locating mediums, with constant bickerings on various minor points, the natural effects of a false base and the true and only cause of all this discord. And now to sum up, we again venture an assertion, that there never was, will, or can be a material form that was not produced by the union of a male and female spirit, or a spiritual being that was not the effect of the disintegration of a material form. Spiritualism may evade the issue as long as old orthodoxy has, but twenty-three eternities will not be long enough to solve the problem of existence on the base of an aristocracy of spirit over matter.

PSYCHOMETRY.

By O. S. Poston.

Many philosophers have asserted that all the avenues of knowledge are embraced by the five senses—seeing, hearing, feeling, tasting and smelling. There are, however, other capacities of the human soul not generally developed nor, indeed, supposed to exist, which demand the notice of those who are disposed to investigate the occult sciences; one of which I desire to present in a series of papers.

Forty years ago, Dr. James Buchanan, for merly a lecturer in the Eclectic Medical College of Cincinnati, also a man of genius who made many discoveries in phrenology and kindred sciences, ascertained that persons of sensitive organization could derive a correct impression, from a letter or autograph, of the mental development and moral and physical condition of the writer. He names that sense, the Psychometric, being derived from Greek words meaning soul measure. He asserts that three out of five Southern ladies have the capacity, and that it can be developed, as any other gift by exercise.

His theory is that there emanates from each individual, an aura or magnetic influence that impresses itself on the writing of the person, and thus enables those gifted with the Psychometric sense to read the writer's character.

This intelligence is not derived from feeling the writing and forming an opinion from the shape of the letters, but comes intuitively from contact with the writing. A lock of hair or any article worn by the person will answer the purpose just as well as a specimen of the handwriting.

Dr. Buchanan locates the Psychometric sense just above the nose and eyes, and it is proper, in experiments, to hold the article to that part of the forehead till the impressions are derived from it that indicate the character.

I attended, some years ago, a private class of Dr. Buchanan, and, out of sixteen persons, four possessed the faculty more or less, and one lady could hold the letter in her hand and give a very correct description of the writer.

Dr. B's method of proceeding was as follows: Having procured the letters of several persons of marked character, he tore them up and distributed the pieces amongst his class, with directions for each one to assume an easy position, with the right arm resting on a table or the back of a chair; and hold the scrap of letter without any personal examination of it, gently pressed by the hand on the forehead just above the nose and eyes.

The experimenter should close his eyes and observe closely his impressions and thoughts as they arise. Several hours after eating is the more favorable time, and all disturbing influences should be silenced and removed. At first perhaps only general impressions will arise in the mind as to the stronger traits of character of the writer, or the feelings most active at the time the letter was penned. He should be questioned as to what he thinks as to particular traits and feelings, and is advised to investigate closely, matters connected with the person he is trying to describe.

Some persons not only thus delineate the character, capacity and emotions but also the physical condition of the system of the subject psychometrized, describing diseases, &c. But to obtain perfection, it requires time and educational processes resulting from mental practice, unless in cases where the gift or talent is remarkably full and acts spontaneously.

Old letters seem to preserve all the elements requisite for experiment, provided they have not been intermixed with those of other persons.

I have seen many psychometrical delineations of character more full and accurate than those written by experienced phrenological examiners.

In the United States, a great many ladies devote themselves to psychometry as a profession, and realise a support from the practice of it alone.

To most persons, this capacity will appear, no doubt, wonderful and even incredible; but many experiments have demonstrated it to be an existing sense of the human soul which in the spiritual existence, will become more perfect, thus enabling us to read at a glance the capacity and moral condition of every spirit with whom we may associate.

As an evidence of immortality, drawn from the great and latent powers of the soul, it is also worthy of our consideration.

Voices from the People.

ST. MARYS, OHIO.—A. B. writes.—The writer of an elaborate article headed "A Search after God," in the Journal, says: "We cannot conceive perfection in man. * * * Through his instrumentality, and his alone, worlds and systems of worlds are evolved."

Now, it is fair to suppose that if this is true, that he made a portion of the worlds, that he made them all; and it suggests the inquiry—which Brother Francis can unquestionably answer, whether man existed before any worlds were created, or whether, as the question has been sometimes asked, did the oak originally spring from the acorn, or the acorn from the oak?

Remarks.—Your questions will be answered in due time.

SIOUX CITY, IOWA.—Jacob Simpson writes.—Your "Search After God" is very interesting, and extremely ingenious—but it seems to me there can be no end to it. The author attempts to prove that all the suns and planets, and other moving bodies in the sidereal heavens, are the work of spirits. It is the universal testimony of all, so far as I can learn, that all mankind were born on planets, and if such is the fact, who made the first planet? The thing created, cannot be older than the creator. The works and creation have always been a mystery to me, and all the theories concerning God that I have ever heard of, appear to me to be untenable. It is generally supposed that God's power is unlimited, and that he is perfect in goodness; if such is the case, why is there so much human being, and every living thing happy. Such a thing as pain could not exist in the universe. There has never been an argument produced yet, that proves to me that anything in the universe has any more power than has been used, or is in use. Of what use is all this extra power, if it is never used? Suppose I had the ability to invent a flying machine that would transport persons and freight from one country to another all so fast and at one tenth what it now costs by any known mode of traveling, and in such a way that no accident could possibly happen,—of what use would all this knowledge and power amount to, if I never used it, nor ever instructed any one else, so that they might benefit mankind by it? All would say it was useless.

MARMATON, KANSAS.—A. E. Fyl writes.—There is a singular case of a young girl here who has what her parents call crazy spells. She was formerly from Pennsylvania. The best physicians there and in New York, doctored her for them, but without any success. Her parents came West with her, hoping to cure her by change; but, instead they have become worse. When they first came, she seemed to faint away and fall, but now she will be standing with her eyes wide open, and apparently sound asleep. These spells apparently last from twenty-five minutes to an hour, when a sweat on her limbs are nearly powerless. Her parents are not Spiritualists, but highly respectable people. Can any one of your readers suggest a remedy for her? I am very much interested in "The Journal, especially in your "Search After God." It is truly interesting. I think few can fail to be benefitted by its perusal.

PORTSMOUTH, VA.—A. Fauth writes—Please find inclosed a three dollar money order, for renewal of my subscription to the Journal, as I see my time has expired. I think it can not long survive it (semi weekly.) Your "Search After God" is a master piece.

MOTT HAVEN, N. Y.—Louis H. Lee writes.—Two numbers of your very ably conducted paper having come to my hands, I have read with special interest the article of your correspondent in the twenty three, and the criticism of George White on the "Search After God." I am moved to offer a brace of queries of my own, and which, I think, will serve to show some of the inconsistencies of the writer in question. First, the conversation occurring between Lucretus and the Spirit, the Spirit is represented as saying that the denizens of the spirit world could organize and elaborate from the elements in the wood, etc., which they found. Now, who, or what power created or brought into existence, this material or three elements, from which he proposes to elaborate his wool and flesh? Again, what is the power of person, and set up that wonderfully complex machinery of brains and heart, thought and feeling, into motion? Is each individual spirit "self creative," consequently a God?

Remarks.—The brother who writes the above, like thousands of others, has had his mind agitated by the "Search after God." He has read four or five articles, written long after the commencement of the series, and without waiting to see further elaborations on the same subject, straightway comes to the conclusion that we can not accomplish the object we have in view. Statements made in one article, may not be fully explained by our guide for six or eight numbers of the paper. He makes bold statements, and does not fully explain them until it suits his own good time. If Mr. Lee will peruse the whole series, he will have no reason to be alarmed, but if he can not believe our statements to be true, he will wish them so.

MIDDLEPORT, OHIO.—M. J. Evans writes.—Brother Francis' "Search After God" is pursuing the same line of thought that my mind has travelled for years on that subject. I never expressed my views, except to one man, and his thoughts coincide with mine. I asked him the question, "Who is God?" He replied, "All of us." In other words, God is the sum total of the worlds of space." This may not be exactly Brother F's idea, but very similar, I think.

NEW ORLEANS, LA.—J. Daylight writes.—I read in your last issue, volume nine, number twenty one, "What! Man make a planet! Launch into the regions of space a comet, organize a system of worlds for unfoldments of other races of human beings? Yes; we say, emphatically, yes. Man, what can't he do; what don't he do?" Where is your God that he does anything outside of individual humanity? Now, I would like to know by what agency have the first intelligent human beings been developed? Was not a planet necessary to unfold vegetables, animals, and, through many unknown links, human beings? Is not the development of a planet does it not require a whole solar system? And if some systems must necessarily have been developed without the agency of human beings, to what do they belong, to not all planets and systems of the world? Please answer in your Monthly Journal.

Remarks.—Your interrogations will be considered in due time.

OSAWATOMIE, KANSAS.—A. Taylor writes.—"Who are they?" I am one; but it is not my intention to let the above pertinent question stand an answer to me long. I like the bold, fearless, spirit tone of the Journal. It has the ring of pure metal, which gives forth no uncertain sound. I like the "Search After God." E. V. Wilson's discussion with Rev. Braden, promises also to be a good thing. In fact, the paper is filled with just what humanity most needs. Some people claiming to be Spiritualists, affect to despise the accounts given of physical manifestations, seeming to be unconscious of the fact, as it appears to me, that these same despised raps and tips are the sub stratum of the whole structure of Spiritualism,—so far as phenomenal evidence is concerned. Once they are proven beyond peradventure to be directly the work of embodied man, then can I join hands with the poor old Boston Investigator and say, "Spiritualism is all a monstrous delusion." But I have seen the one, and heard the other, and they stand the heralds of immortality, and stumbling blocks to all selfish theories, be they rap and tip. Let scientists trace them home; if they are strictly mundane, let them prove it.

JAMESTOWN, TENN.—L. Bush writes.—It is with much pleasure I receive your noble, generous, and critical Journal. The unfoldment of new views, a rational relation we hold to each other, the certainty of life immortal, in contradistinction to old theology, is certainly a new light, and a lamp to the darkness of earth. The "Search After God" is an awakening—a moral earthquake—rousing the slumbering millions wrapped in the garb of church fellowship. The "Search" is wending its way with the understanding of thousands who dared not heretofore allow themselves to think upon that subject.

REMARKS ON DR. HECKER'S LECTURE BY ONE OF HIS OWN CHURCH.

Letter from J. T. Blakeney.

Dear Journal:—Through the kindness of an esteemed neighbor, an abstract of Dr. Hecker's Lecture on "Spiritualism" is before me, in your paper of 11th Feb. last.

I had no sooner read this lecture, than I felt like committing to paper a few thoughts, to which it gave rise in my mind—but seeing, in the following issue of your paper, the promise of an answer to the lecture, I at once relinquished my intention, expecting that the forthcoming answer would be all that could be desired. Well, the answer came, but owing to some cause (certainly not the intrinsic difficulty of the thing) the answer was not satisfactory, to me, at least.

His lecture should be answered, or, perhaps I should say criticised; and I will tell you another thing: the criticism should be done, or might profitably be done by one of Dr. Hecker's own denomination, such as I am, or at least, have been for sixty years of the sixty-eight that I have honestly battled for Catholicism.

Coming from a distinguished priest of the Catholic Church here in America, this lecture, as I look on it, is a most suggestive and important document. There is no fog—no shuffling in it. It is clear, explicit, direct, and it fully and unequivocally endorses all that Spiritualists claim as essential in their philosophy; namely, that "those who are in the present stage of existence, can [and do] hold communication with the spirits of those who have passed away from earth." Not only this, but now (for the learned doctor of Catholic Divinity expresses his surprise, "that one intelligent Christian community, believing in the Bible and its teachings, should be startled by the announcement"), "The testimony," says he, "of all history, is in its favor." This is candid.

Considering the reticence of the other priests of "our holy religion" on this subject, and their hostility to it, it is most surprising that Father Hecker has been so candid and outspoken. But it must be recollected that he came from the Protestants to us, and has brought with him into his new position much of their characteristic independence of thought and frankness of manner. He wasn't cyed in the wool as were the others, hence, this non-Catholic confession of faith—"in other words, of the truth."

But we should be mistaken if we supposed that Father Hecker wholly forgot his position and duties as a Catholic priest. He knew that he should bring in the Catholic Church as necessary, indeed, as indispensable in our world. To do this, how must he proceed? He must show that, though Spiritualism is substantially true, there is danger in it which it behooves it and protected outside the pale of the Catholic Church, but that inside that pale and subject to the priests, the bishops and the Pope, it is just the thing. The Catholic Church is a developing institution. What it don't make within itself, it can take from without, and what it takes it can sanctify. It has taken a good deal from Paganism,—some not having the flesh of God on the church before they were, say, all; but we will not go into that now.

Father Hecker wants to take Spiritualism into the church. Outside, it is, he feels, an ugly customer for the church to deal with; but once in, it would become as harmless as a dove and as pure and profitable as gold. "There are," said he, "two sides to this belief (Spiritualism),—a light side and a dark side; an angelic and a diabolic; a divine and a profane." But is not the Rev. Father's church in a like predicament? Do not the most eminent Catholic divines maintain that the "field," the "floor" and the "net," in which the good and the bad were mixed up together, symbolize or represent the church? Dr. Hecker is a great man in the church, but a greater than he in the same church, writes as follows:

"I admit that a vast number of incredible and false miracles, as well as other fables, have been forged by some, and believed by other Catholics in every age of the church, from the first of the apostles."—Bishop Milner's end of controversy. Letter xxiii. Falsehoods in vast numbers and in every age! How, then, is the advantage of joining the church, especially when you must leave your reason at the door—while in Spiritualism, you are not only permitted to retain it, but exhorted to use and rely on it all through to the end, as the best defense against imposture?

But let us look a little more specifically at the dark side of Spiritualism, as from the works of distinguished Spiritualists. It is with great fairness presented by the doctor. He says that the Spiritualists, whom he names, "show that from their own experience, they had arrived at the conclusion that the communications with the spirits were imperfect, because the mediums were often imperfect, the conditions imperfect, the spirits themselves deceptive, and capable of assuming false guises, and thereby making untruthful revelations." Then, after giving a little more of like characters from Judge Edmonds and others, he thus concludes:

"Thus, by the confession of their own advocates, these spiritual mediums and the spirits with whom they are in intercourse, stand convicted of being unreliable, untruthful and dangerous."

Bet all this be granted, and what does it amount to? Is there an intelligent and reflecting man alive, who would expect in such a world as ours, a state of things any different? If, at times past, even absolute revelations of revelation respecting the grand works of nature, because mistakes and other imperfections mixed themselves up with it, where would the world be to-day? Spiritualism is in its infancy, and must submit to the conditions of infancy. Give it room; treat it kindly instead of crushing it; help it along, and like all other natural sciences, it may yet bless the world with the fruits of its full maturity.

"The spirits all agree that they have never seen God." If they agreed in the opposite, they would be liars. Observe, they don't deny that there is a God. Indeed they all, I believe, maintain that there is.

"Believers in modern Spiritualism, believe also, that God in the abstract, is a nonentity. Thus they have got rid of God."

The word "abstract" is fatal to the learned doctor's conclusion. Surely the doctor does not believe that God is an abstraction. He lives in the concrete that is, as connected with his works. Those who thus believe can not be said to have gotten "rid of God."

"The same acknowledged spiritual authority denies also the existence of sin and of the devil." There is an unintentional misrepresentation here. Spiritualists do not deny the existence of sin; but they affirm, because they have it on good authority, that sin will be dealt with very differently from what the Catholic's theology teaches; but they do, indeed, deny the existence of the devil; and this, instead of being a fact to tell against them, is fast coming to be an unmistakable note of the truth of their philosophy. The world moves, doctor, and it is leaving the old faith in the devil, and devil-worship behind.

"He," the doctor, "related several anecdotes concerning the difficulties of an inquirer after spiritual knowledge, through a medium who pretended to obtain written communications, signed by the spirit of any dead person, whose name should be written on a slip of paper. In this manner the inquirer got a spiritual letter from a friend of his, who, happily, was still in the flesh, and doing a thriving business in Mercer Street, New York. He also at another time wrote his own name on a slip of paper, and presently received a long communication from his own spirit. The inquirer then made up his mind that he was down on all such chicanery and mummery, and denounced it as a delusion and a fraud."

Dr. Hecker can perpetrate a pleasantry. Let us see. He was the superior of the Paulist Fathers, of whom, if I mistake not, "Blessed Paul of the Cross" was the founder. Now the life of that blessed personage lies open before me. It was placed in my hands some four or five years since by one of the parishonist fathers here, to preserve me from "chicanery and delusion," nor was it given in vain. Here's the passage:

"At another time, while seated at dinner with the Giffredi in the town of Fondi, a roasted chicken was placed on the table, but the holy man forbade any one to touch it, remarking that the fowl belonged to a poor woman, whose support greatly depended on the eggs laid by it. And it had been stolen in order to sell it to the family whose hospitality he was enjoying. He then ordered that a window should be opened, and blessed the fowl, which was immediately restored to life, and with grown feathers took its flight, and returned to the disconsolate widow from whom it had been stolen." Life of Blessed Paul of the Cross, chap. iv, p. 270.

Some may say that there is no "delusion or fraud" here, but I think that Father Hecker himself will admit that there is considerable chickenery in it. I commend the book to your readers. It will repay perusal, for the above does not stand there alone.

REPLY TO AUSTIN KENT.

Letter from J. Tinney.

It seems impossible for us to be understood. Bro. Kent says:

"I think what you call unbalanced is as natural as what you call balanced, and is as eternal as matter and mind. The two forces have been in an endless past action, and have not, as yet, come to a perfect balance."

About how long before they will reach it? We deny that the ocean of positive and negative forces, in which all worlds float, and from which they derived their origin,—call it mind and matter, cause and effect, male and female, or what you please,—has ever been unbalanced. On the contrary, a positive current ever flows from negative matter; a negative current from positive mind, blending and making the two one by interchange—the grand battery of the universe. Till this is refuted your question is answered.

Again, the most natural, normal, healthy and well balanced cat will kill and eat the most mice, and a healthy mouse makes the best food for a cat.

We think that each material world has its attendant spirit world, being as much a necessity as the male and female are in their outgrowths, and in which all their outgrowths are represented, whether mice, cats, men, or any other animals of English or American extraction, and that development is produced by transition from one side to the other, through all the successive stages of existence.

Please point out the wrong in our base or starting point; if that is wrong, our deductions will necessarily be so. We assumed that unbalanced conditions of the pores that constitute the individuality of Bro. Kent, or any one else, is the cause of the evils by which they are afflicted, without reference to relations existing between different individuals. Basic principles before theorizing.

We have given our views on the relations existing between mind and matter. Will friend Kent be equally explicit? If so, we think we can study and learn him. If we differ on basic principles, can we expect to agree on minor ones? There are certain rules on which we all agree; we believe them to be the base on which existence is founded, and that the cause of discord is in trying to evade them.

Finally, our theory is based on the fact that all the parts are equal to and balance the whole; while no account of mice can balance Bro. Kent's cat:—the same old "spirit and matter" theory, disguised and taking refuge under the form of cats and mice.

"THE DEVIL DID IT."

Letter from Edwin Hillyer.

Brother Jones:—I again take pen in hand to record another victory which we have achieved here,—a victory which did not cost us an effort.

There is an Adventist here, and he has delivered one lecture against Spiritualism, but instead of gaining a victory for himself, he only confirmed the phenomenal part of Spiritualism. His plan was to devote one half of his time to telling what he had seen of the workings of it, and the other half to laying it to that extensive gentleman, the Devil.

Of the phenomena, he had seen a piano of a thousand pounds lifted from the floor by a girl simply laying her hand on it; had seen the same piano crash the feet of one of the committee, because he put it under its leg, to see if it was really lifted. He had seen the Davenport brothers, and had been chosen one of the committee at one of their seances. A spirit had called him to come and be tied between the "boys," in an audible voice, which the whole assembly heard. He said that he told the spirit that he was fully convinced that there was no humbug about it, and did not care to go into the cabinet; but he said they (the spirits) talked as much as fifteen minutes with him,—all the time trying to get him to come into the cabinet; but he finally had to tell them he would not, whereupon they coaxed an eminent citizen of New York, whose name I have forgotten, to come into the mysterious place, and he tied between the two brothers, and the spirits pinched him and struck him in the face, until he halloed "murder! let me out! they will kill me! etc." He said that they put private marks on the rope, slyly sprinkled flour in the Davenports' hands, and then tied them so tight that no human skill could untie them, and just as quick as the cabinet door was shut, there were three visible hands thrust out of an aperture so high up that the tallest man in the room could just reach it with the tips of his fingers. They put a chair under it, and there were several people who went and shook hands with the spirit manifesting; and one young man put tar on his hands, and they came very near shaking him to pieces; and he related all that transpired at that seance, and many wonderful things which he had seen. It took him as much as an hour to tell it in as concise a form as possible.

In the latter part of the discourse, he tried to show it to be the work of the Devil. He quoted some from the Bible, and a great deal of spiritual literature, and he misconstrued Judge Edmonds' statements.

After he got through, Mr. Pearl asked him if it did look well for God to give man laws, and then make a bargain with the Devil to go and deceive him, and to even give him the power to appear in the form of a near and dear relative or friend, and to even know a secret which only himself and the deceased were in possession of? The answer to this was, that God was going to let the Devil deceive the people as much as possible, but there would be a time when the deceiver and deceived should suffer alike. Then followed other questions and answers, but I do not remember them.

Letter from Frank McCollyer.

Brother Jones:—I am indebted to you for the Journal for one year, and it pains me to inform you that I am unable to remit to you at present, but the good angels helping me, you shall have your just dues the coming month. We can not do without your paper.—It has become a household necessity, and we patiently await its weekly arrival, and none, I think, that have received it here, will fail to pay all arrearages. No, Brother Jones, I have too good an opinion of the Spiritualists in this place, to think for one moment, that there is one here who will fail to pay for their paper.

Kendallville, Ind., Mar. 29, 1871.

Remarks:—Thank you, brother, for your kind words of assurance. It is with pleasure we work and toil,—giving credit as necessity requires, when thus appreciated.

We have to be severe upon those who are so heartless as to receive the benefits of good intentions— or labor and our money—for one or more years, and then sneak off to another locality to again impose upon another publisher, without ever paying for value received! When all other remedies fail let the scalpel be used, if necessary!

Letter from P. A. Eddy.

But for the interposition of Providence, the Rev. Dr. Goodrich would undoubtedly have taken the train from New York with other passengers who met with an awful fate on Monday night last. It was his intention to take that train, but he arrived from New Haven a few minutes too late to secure a seat in the fated coach.—Cleveland Herald.

Was it the same providence that permitted the only son of the editor of the Herald with others, to take that fatal car in that train on that fatal night? Is providence killing some in a manner that chills the blood and makes humanity recoil and shudder, even at a distance from the dread'ul scene, while others of far less importance to the world for present and future usefulness, are saved by his interposition and timely care? Verily the ways of providence are mysterious and past finding out!!

It may be all plain enough to the students and teachers of theology, but to those who believe God is impartial, and no respecter of persons, this old fossil idea of providence killing some and saving others, will only excite in the minds of all sensible people, no other sentiments than those of pity and disgust.

PROF. HOWE'S

GRAMMAR.

The writer of this useful book has had a practical experience in the art of teaching of upwards of thirty years. He had long been impressed that a shorter pathway to grammar than that which led through the perplexing subtleties of the text books could be secured; and with much skill devised his "Seven-Hour system" of oral teaching. Appeals from his audiences and requests from correspondents abroad became so numerous and repeated, that he was compelled to put his ideas into print to satisfy the public demand. His discoveries in the science are many and startling, reducing the labor, in many instances, from years to minutes. The limited governing power of the Transitive Verb from 50,000 words to seven; his rotating or vibrating "6," securing syntactical agreement between the Verb and Noun; his exposition of the Subjunctive Mood and Proposition, with many other interesting features of the work, are not only original, but might with very great propriety be considered inspirational. These are of the utmost value to the the public writer, the platform speaker, the clergyman, or the orator. Fifteen minutes attention to any one of them will protect any intelligent person from erring once in a lifetime!

The work is got up in pamphlet form of about 50 pages, strong and neat covers, with large plain type, containing everything within, in its simplest essence, to constitute the Practical Grammarian. It is not sold for the value of the paper, print, or binding, but for the Seven-Hour grammatical education contained within.

MEDIUMS' DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete directory, giving the places of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. It is will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the location of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time, that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a lamenta le fact that some mediums so far forget their self respect as to speak evilly of other mediums, frequently some of those who are for their superiors. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Register so soon as we have evidence conclusive of their indulging in such unlikeness.

It should be borne in mind that individuals visiting mediums carry conditions with themselves—to speak—which aid or destroy the power of spirits to control the medium visited: hence it is that one medium gives satisfaction to certain persons, another better to others—all having their friends, and justly so, too; and all equally honest and useful in their place.

TERMS OF THE

Religio-Philosophical Journal.

$3,00 per year, $1,50—6 months, $1,—4mo.

☞ Fifty Cents for Three Months on trial TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or POST-OFFICE MONEY ORDER, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to FIFTEEN CENTS, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. ALL Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3.50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names RETURNED on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to Dec. 10th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith J.—10 Dec.—0." The 0 means 1870. If he has only paid to Dec. 10th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—10 Dec.—9, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as 70 for 1870, or 69 for 1869.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL, should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

NUMBER XXXV.

Statements of Lucretos—His Experiences in passing through the Change Called Death—Sudden Deaths Injurious to the Spirit—Embryotic Life of Jesus—The Holy Ghost that he was Filled with—The Commencement of Time—The First Man, What about him—Reasonable Conclusions in Reference to his "Origin."

Lucretus—Oh, I am bewildered—lost in the contemplation of the scenes around me! How little I understand of existence. When on earth, mingling with the mortals there, associating with them from day to day, and being the recipient of favors which prosperity brings, and ill-luck which is the result of adversity, I often wondered why there exists such diversity in life, and believed myself highly favored in the results that accompanied my exertions. But now I see my exact condition. Wealth gave me power; power made me ambitious, and I used it for self-aggrandizement. I was exacting in my demands, intolerant in my views, and never hesitated to pursue any line of conduct to promote my own special welfare. I went to church, paid exorbitant sums to ministers and foreign missions, indulged regularly in prayer, attended all religious gatherings, and while free and liberal in one direction, I would distress my own tenants—turn out of doors a family struggling with adverse circumstances, believing, as I did, that through the blood of Jesus all my sins would be wiped away. I searched for God in the winding labyrinths of nature, in the unfolding of a flower, and in the commotion of the elements. I believed in his existence. I heard him in the early songs of the birds, saw him glisten in the dew-drop pendant from some parched shrub; in fact, in all nature I seemed to recognize the hand divine. When I died, or passed through that change called death, little did I anticipate what would follow. I will relate to you briefly the character of that change, if you desire it.

Spirit—I would be glad to listen to you. Each one experiences different sensations in passing through this change, and many times the narration thereof is intensely interesting. Please proceed.

Lucretus—I had been taught in my early childhood that there existed a Devil as well as a God, and that the former presided over the regions of hell, and seemed to take delight in punishing those whom circumstances assigned to him. In the mature years of my life, the idea of a Devil and a Hell of fire gradually passed from my mind, and I became fully conscious of the fact that none existed. It was a difficult task for me even to advance that much, but then through a course of reasoning peculiar to myself, I finally firmly believed that a God existed, but I changed his nature to suit my own convenience. When believing in a Hell of fire and brimstone, I was necessarily compelled to worship a God who wished all his children eventually happy, but had not the power to make them so. As soon as I dispensed with a Hell, I changed the nature of my God somewhat. Thus, I found that from early childhood to mature years, I was constantly making gods, —each one different from the one which preceded it. I indulged in prayer regularly twice a day, in the morning and evening, until I finally concluded that God, being unchangeable and "without a shadow of variation," that my prayers would result in no good to myself. How could an unchangeable God bless me? As well, I thought, ask the unchanging river to alter its course, or the rugged mountains to become valleys, or the arid desert a fertile field. Under the impulse of these thoughts, I ceased my regular devotion—worship around the family altar—but still remained a member of the church, and was always in good standing. When I was prostrated with sickness, the minister of my church visited me, and fervently prayed for God to receive my soul into his kingdom, and being so very weak, I became imbued with the idea that I should be highly favored, and, under the influence of his fervent prayers, I became partially psychologized, and entertained notions precisely similar to his own. I waited anxiously for death. Occasionally I would catch a glimpse of the other world, and during one of the paroxysms through which I was constantly passing, it was thought I was dead, and I saw such beautiful scenes; little children with bouquets of flowers, and my own friends that passed away before me, and many others, greeted me. My vision, at times clear and distinct, could see the beautiful scenes of the Spirit World, but only as a flash of light, and then sweet strains of music would strike upon my ear for a moment. Then I thought surely that God was present,—that through his instrumentality I was being gradually prepared for his reception. The paroxysms of disease through which I passed caused but little suffering to myself, and I glided into the arms of "death" as naturally as a child to sleep in the embrace of its mother. During all this time, I would occasionally lose my consciousness, only to be revived again, and each time, new scenes and truths flashed through my mind. During the last paroxysm, I felt that I was attached to the body. I recognized the fact that I had the various limbs of the external organism, but could not use them—could not move. Then, for a moment, I felt exceedingly strange. My spiritual body seemed permanently attached to my physical frame, yet I could see without any effort of the sight or will. Under these circumstances, while I was connected with the physical form, I could see every part of it as well as those in attendance, and heard the physician distinctly declare, "His pulse no longer beats—he is dead." I thought this assertion very strange; as I could hear the words of those present, see their emotions of sorrow, realize the heart-rending cries of my wife and children; yet I looked upon the scene for a few moments without a particle of emotion arising within my mind. I appeared to be within the body, yet I could not use it. The condition that I was in, seemed to perplex and annoy me. I was neither a spirit, free and independent, nor was I connected with a physical body that I could use. This strange, bewildering sensation did not long continue, for I soon arose from my prison-house; but during that time, I was utterly unconscious. During the passage of the spirit from the body, it is generally unconscious, in the same sense that all are during sleep. There is one stage through which I passed, and that was perfect lucidity or clairvoyance. I seemed to see everything. In the far distance I observed a large city, near a lake surrounded by a dense forest, in which I saw untold numbers of birds, singing their sweet songs and enlivening those that visited the various places with their presence. I seemed to see them, as I see now, but every thing was to my senses more grand, because so new to me. Those mountains I have traversed, that river I have since sailed upon, and those villas, with their environments of groves and water scenery that I have visited, I then caught bright glimpses of. But it was only for a moment, and then I became unconscious. I thought surely on reviving I was in the far-famed heaven I had thought so much about, and I looked in every direction for the throne of God. I was surrounded by my friends and a bevy of little children. I then, as you well know, was as anxious to find God as I am now. Death, I find to be only a change—a casting off of the outer, thus giving an opportunity for the spirit to act in a different sphere.

Spirit—Your experiences then will always be of interest to you. Connected with all death scenes, there is a spirit circle who superintend the same, and judicious care and skill is always exercised on those occasions, and the spirit greatly benefitted thereby. Sudden deaths are always injurious to the spirit, for it ripens under the influence of the natural decay of the body. In battle, there are many sudden deaths, and many months frequently intervene before the new-born spirit awakens to consciousness, or realizes the fact that they are in the Spirit World. Indeed, it is often difficult to convince such spirits that they are in the Spirit World. You may take them to the physical body and show it to them, still their own spiritual body is so tangible that they seem yet in earth-life. The spirit derives certain elements from the body when it decays naturally, that are essential to it, and which must be obtained from some source. Those who require such elements are compelled to come en rapport with the material things of earth, and through their instrumentality they absorb, sponge-like, what they require. Spirits that have never had any of earth's experiences are compelled to pursue this course, and by this means are enabled to advance.

Lucretus—I supposed that death was controlled by this God whom I so devoutly worshiped, for I entertained the idea that it was through his instrumentality I was brought forth, and that through his power I would be taken away.

Spirit—In the Spirit World, we know not that God does anything. Each individual on the earth plane of life, is accompanied with a circle of spirits. Their influence over each individual, depends upon certain well-defined conditions, and what they do is generally ascribed to God. A circle of spirits controlled the conception, birth and life of Jesus Christ. Their motives were pure, and the object accomplished to the world, has been of lasting benefit. The shepherds on the mountains heard the joyful cry, "This day a Savior has been born," and the announcement was made by a spirit to these shepherds, because they were mediumistic, and could hear their voice. In those days, the residents of the mountains were more mediumistic than those in the valleys, for circumstances were more favorable for their development. In regard to Jesus, no God had anything to do with his conception or birth. I have studied his history well, traced his life lines, and I know my statements are correct. You seem to think Jesus the son of God. You are greatly mistaken therein. I desire by and by to present to you more clearly the action of different circles of spirits. St. Luke once had a flash of inspiration that revealed to him clearly the status of the development of Jesus, for he said, as I have stated before, that "He was filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb." It is well-known that life commences in a single nucleofated cell, and therein is a correct likeness of that which it will produce. The acorn has within it the outlines of the oak, and so has each nucleolated cell in the womb, the outlines of the future man or woman. There are certain peculiarities connected with all things, that stamps each with a certain individuality. In this little cell, the starting point of the embryotic life on earth, is the outlines of what it will produce,—either a male or female. Nothing can be more sensitive than this little germ. The magnetic needle can not be more easily influenced by the subtile power of the lodestone than this little germ by surrounding influences. The passions of the mother are impressed upon it,—her thoughts and desires so develop it as to give it marked traits of character. Now, the spirit circle who had this embryotic germ in charge, showered down upon it their magnetic and electric influences, and it was this that St. Luke regarded as the Holy Ghost.

Lucretus—You seem to take every thing out of the hands of Deity.

Spirit—In this wise arrangement, we observe the direct action of individualized intelligence. Now, we know that monstrosities are often produced by the direct agency of a spirit circle, and are allowed to exist for a certain purpose. There is guardianship exercised over embryotic life, as well as that of mature years, and it is then that the mind is given certain tendencies. On earth, all this is ascribed to a God. No one can demonstrate what caused matter, —it has eternally existed. The poor ignoramus could see a block of ice turn to water, and then to steam, and then imagine it had disappeared or had been annihilated. There is no cause for the existence of matter. If a cause, then it has not eternally existed. Now if a God, who is omnipresent, he is only contemporaneous with matter,—he can be no older than that, and are the laws of matter the laws of God? If matter has eternally existed, it has possessed certain properties, and are not these properties perfectly independent of a God? If God can not annihilate matter, can he annihilate, or render obsolete, any of its laws or properties? Now, supposing your theory to be true, there was a time when there was no universe. If God made all things, that implies a commencement, hence, that would infer that previous to that commencement, God had done nothing. Now, to those who ascribe all works to God, there must have been a starting point for all things. What, pray, was he doing up to the time that he commenced his grand career,—his universe? To suppose a first man—who was he, pray, who is he? If his existence can be attributed to a God, then there was a time when throughout all space, there was no human life; under what circumstances did God create him? He must have made him out of existing material; out of material that was eternal, for we know that matter is indestructible as well as eternal. Certain principles are self-evident. With such a God as the world seems inclined to worship, certain things are impossible. Was it not, considering all the circumstances of the case, impossible for him to create a human being,—intelligent personality? What would lead him to do it? Supposing there had been no matter, could he have created one? Without matter, there would have been no use of a God, for you would have had no existence, to recognize him. Now, please tell me what induced God to think of an individualized intelligence? He made the first one, as you claim. Previous to the first creation, there was then an endless age of time; but at a certain period, God comes to the conclusion that he will make man. Which did he control in the process of formation, his own forces, or those of matter? You may say both. Then tell me, to which forces man owes allegience, to those of matter or those of God? Without matter, God would be powerless; without God, matter would still possess its own peculiar characteristics. Which, then, is of really the most importance? Matter would possess certain characteristics without a God, but God would be as feeble as a breath of wind without matter. Now, did God use matter exclusively, and its properties, to make a human being? If he used anything outside of matter and its laws, he must have used himself; hence, man is composed of two qualities that have eternally existed—matter and its properties, and God and his properties. Where is the dividing line between the two? And if God is constantly using himself to make individualized intelligences, please tell me how many years before he will be completely used up? If God possesses all power, when he imparted any of that to the first individualized intelligence he constructed, he must have felt weakened, for he certainly dispensed with some of his strength. The first man—as well speak of the commencement of time! As well assert that there was a first hour! If there was an endless past, there must be an endless future! In the endless past, there was a time you assert, when there was no individualized intelligence, and that through the instrumentality of God, one was brought forth. Forces that are organized, can be disorganized. That which is created, can also be destroyed; and we are under the complete control of that God of yours. If this spiritual organization of mine was organized by him, it can be disorganized by him, and we are at his mercy. Really, then, it is well for humanity to "Search for a God." If you owe your existence to him, become his slave, worship him, pay him homage, sing songs of praise to his Lordship, for at any time he can disorganize what he has organized, and man ceases to be immortal! Now, was the first man made as the mechanic would build a house, in order to see how he would appear? If this God had never seen a human being, the first man must have been the result of an experiment, and if Adam was the first one, he was a miserable failure. If he was made through the action of God, how many laws of matter and how many laws of God were employed? It would be well to ponder this question well. If you are composed of God and matter, to which are you responsible? How can you tell what you are acting, and to which you owe allegiance? If the God is acting, you can make no mistake, and if you do, he is responsible; and if matter and its laws are acting, they are old enough to know what is best, for they have eternally existed. Again, if man was so made, he must have been constructed with certain inherent tendencies. His construction would imply that. There can be no absolute creation without a design. If God created the first man, he had a design in so doing, and that design would have been successfully carried out, or the job would have been a failure. To say that any man is a failure, would be derogatory to the character of this God, and would imply that he could make mistakes. Supposing I should say that the germ of man had always existed, and that there are beautiful interblendings of that germ and matter,—then, man not being organized,—for the germ, full and complete, had always existed,—I would establish his immortality, for that which has always existed, always will exist. What God organizes, he can disorganize, and if our claim to immortality rests on such a basis as that, it would be well to more closely study our relations to him, and endeavor to serve him more faithfully. He who can establish the fact that the soul is immortal, and that, too, independent of any Infinite God, is certainly doing a grand work. Now, the germ of each individualized intelligence always lived, or it was organized by God, and previous to that time, an eternity of years, as it were, existed. Time in the past was of endless duration, as well as that of the future is to be. If time had no beginning, who will attempt to fathom the years that elapsed before the happy thought happened to occur to the Deity, to make an individualized intelligence? If God made him, how do you know he is immortal? What evidence have you that he did the job well? Is it more difficult to believe that man, as a germ, always existed, than that matter and its laws always existed, and are indestructible? Which had you rather believe, that God made the first man, or that the germ from which he springs is contemporaneous with matter, and eternally existed? If God made him, he is dependent on him for immortality; but if, like matter, the germ of his nature always existed, he is dependent on no one for his immortality. In the future this grand question will be fully considered.

THE WHIPPING-POST.

Shocking Spectacle at Hamilton, Canada.

A correspondent, writing from Hamilton, Canada, gives the following account of the flogging of two boys in the court-house of that city, on Thursday last:

The sentence of the court upon the two boys, John Collins and Sylvester Glue alias Canel, convicted of indecent assault, was carried out at the court-house at three o'clock this afternoon, in the presence of the sheriff, jail surgeon, jailor, representatives of the press, and other officials of the jail. At three o'clock the boys were brought out of their cells, half dead with fright at the terrible punishment which awaited them, and both crying bitterly. The surgeon made an examination as to the condition of the two boys, and pronounced them as in a fit state to receive the sentence of the law. They were then escorted to the wood-shed, on the west side of the court-house, where a rack had been previously arranged. To this, Sylvester Glue alias Sylvester Canel was first strapped, after having been stripped to the waist. He stood with his face to the rack, hands and feet extended toward either side, and supported in front by his clothes, to prevent too severe friction to that part of his chest which would otherwise come in contact with the rough rack. On his left hand side stood the party selected to administer the whipping, having in his hand a savage-looking affair in the shape of a huge "cat," the handle of which was of oak and about a foot in length, to which was attached nine stout leather thongs. The larger boy, John Collins, was so placed that he could obtain a full view of the punishment to which he was shortly to submit. Everything being in readiness, the signal for the commencement of the flagellation was given by the sheriff, and, baring his arm to the elbow, the whipper began his work. Twenty lashes, according to the sentence of the magistrate, were to be administered to both lads. Swinging the "cat" in a dextrous manner over his head, the lashes descended with lightning-like rapidity upon the bare back of the terrified lad, cutting through the flesh and covering the body with blood and gore. Another blow descended, followed with more gashes and blisters and more blood, and then another and another, until the hearts of the spectators turned sick at the horrible spectacle. During this terrible ordeal the boy rent the air with his screams and imploring cries of "Oh! my mother!" "Doctor, oh! doctor!" and "Oh! you are killing me! you are killing me!" The lashes were counted by the sheriff as they were given, and at the conclusion of the whipping, the boy was released, and the latter boy, John Collins, was stripped and strapped to the frame for the purpose of taking his turn at the lash.

This boy took it harder than the little fellow. He writhed fearfully under each successive stroke, uttering all sorts of terrible imprecations upon the head of the wielder of the lash, and beseeching him to "wait a minute." The effect of the lashes was as apparent in this case as in the other, and when at the conclusion of the punishment he was released, his back was seamed and gashed as if by the knife of a savage, while huge welts or blisters were visible on various parts of the back, shoulders and sides. As soon as the whipping ceased, his crying changed to moaning. The boys were then ordered to their cells, and the attending surgeon ordered a cooling lotion to be immediately applied. They will be dismissed from custody as soon as they are in a fit condition. This is the first case of lashing under the new law in this city, and we entertain no doubt that the effect will be most wholesome as a future preventive of juvenile crime here.—Chicago Daily Times, of March 10th.

Mark the closing remarks of the correspondent:

"This the first case of lashing under the new law in this city, and we entertain no doubt that the effect will be wholesome as a future preventive of juvenile crime here."

Angels of mercy will weep at the institution of this ancient relict of barbarism in the city of Hamilton, at this enlightened age.

One thing is certain,—the heartless correspondent who has so much confidence in the whipping-rack and cat-o-nine-tails, is not a Spiritualist, and the doctors who would give countenance to such a scene by their presence, are not healing mediums, but of the veritable old school, and doubtless strictly evangelical in their religious belief.

Extremes right themselves. Such a scene as is reported, for a petty crime,—reported as an "indecent assault,"—is terrible to think of, much more to be endured by young lads.

Do the devotees of old Theology countenance the laceration of the temples of human souls, and the degradation of youths in this manner, as the best method for reformation? If not, will they join with Spiritualists throughout the country in waging a warfare against such barbarous scenes, and arouse public sentiment to a realization that every child contains the germ of "infinite possibilities," and that they are a part of the great body politic, and creatures of circumstances—vicious or affectionate as it may, as conditions beyond their control have shaped, and are shaping, their destiny. And such being the case, government should see that kind treatment and good schooling, which will bring into action their highest faculties, instead of lacerating their bodies, is provided for them.

Such a scene as is portrayed by the correspondent, would, if practiced by a savage, rouse the indignation of the Christian world; and yet this is done under a new law of a neighboring government!

God pity the mothers who have hearts to weep for the suffering of erring children, who from circumstances are compelled to live where such laws are enacted, at this age of the world! All correct thinkers will join with Spiritualists in raising the alarm. Let it spread far and wide! If such a law can be enacted in Canada, how soon may it be imitated in the States. Already legal enactments curtailing the natural rights of citizens, have been passed in Ohio and Alabama, and perhaps in other states, at the instance of the "regular doctors." It is a like spirit which whips children almost to the extermination of life, as in the case reported. It is that heartless spirit which does not realize the rights of individuals—which does not realize that angel friends stand by and weep at such cruelty—that does not realize that if these children had the guardian care of humane men and women to teach them industry, and to educate them in the very best schools of the age, that they would become the very best citizens of our government in a few years. They manifest a misdirection of the most active minds. They need kind tutors to lead them to become self-sustaining, intelligent men and women.

While laws are being enacted in nearly every country against cruelty to animals, thus protecting them from malice, ignorance and carelessness on the part of the human family, would it not be well to institute such restrictions as will prevent torturing the young—yes, the old even—when they do some act that is not sanctioned by law. Throw around the criminals the affections of human nature, instead of its malice and revenge, and the world will soon make rapid strides in the improvement of its morals.

How long, oh, how long is this ignorant, vindictive spirit to rule the people? Let every Spiritualist throughout the land raise his and her voice against such cruelty. Let every one raise the alarm against legal innovations upon natural rights, and let every one reflect upon and speak of a change in police and other legislative enactments, which shall be addressed to the higher faculties of criminals in the education of every child, and reflect upon the necessity of the public guardianship of all such children as shall be neglected by parents.

It is a good time now to begin to think of and agitate this subject. Let Spiritualists awake to the importance of it, and the angel world will aid in bringing about the desired revolution.

Our columns are open to well-written articles upon this subject.

The Hindoo New Testament.

We have now in press a new book, translated from the ancient Sanscrit, entitled

THE BHAGVAT-GEETA.

This work should go into the hands of every free thinker throughout the world—Spiritualists especially.

Kreeshna, to the Hindoos, occupies precisely the same relation to Brahma (their Almighty God), that Christ does to the Hebrew God in the estimation of Christians.

It is a work of great antiquity, over five thousand years old, and was translated from the ancient Sanscrit (the oldest known written language) into English with great care, by Mr. Charles Wilkins, a learned Englishman, and 261 copies only, were by him published by subscription. The work being so scarce, and held so enormously high, but few persons have ever read, or even seen, or heard of it. Its authenticity is conceded. That it is the foundation of the New Testament of the Christians, will not be doubted by any candid reader.

THE RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE has this work now in press, and in a few days will supply the demand, at the extremely low price of $1.25 per copy, neatly bound in muslin. Postage 16 cents.

We are now prepared to receive orders. First come, first served.

A Fraternal Call.

Our sanctum was enlivened last week by the genial countenance of Mr. Shearman, editor of the Salt Lake Tribune, one of the best papers published in the West. Mr. Shearman is progressive in nature, and gladly receives the truth, from whatever source it may originate. He is opposed to the policy of Brigham Young, and through the influence of the Tribune, Spiritualism is gradually gaining a foothold in Utah.

Very Few Such.

MR. S. S. JONES—Sir:—You have been sending me a paper for some time, I never ordered it, and do not know who did, and will not pay for it. You can get it from the one that ordered it.

Yours, respectfully,
K. RUTCHER.

Middlebury, Mo., Mar. 23, 1871.

Will the friend of the writer of the above letter consider the propriety of "casting pearls before swine?"

He, like a mean man, had been eating at our table fourteen months, and now gets up and kicks at it, thinking he will break all the dishes and play quits on a full stomach. Poor c——, who does not pity him? He must be possessed by a mean spirit! ED. JOURNAL

Inquiry.

BROTHER JONES:—Permit me to inquire through your columns, if our spirit friends have lungs, and do they breathe the same as we in the form. Please inform the ignorant, and oblige.

Yours, respectfully,
J. M. WOOD.

Pittsford, Vt., April 3, 1871.

ANSWER—Most undoubtedly every organ possessed by us in this life will remain as perfect after the death of the body as before. Natural lungs are adapted to breathing gross, natural atmosphere. Spiritual lungs are adapted to the finer element, or spiritual atmosphere. Every faculty has a use on the spiritual plane, quite as important as it had in this life. Every organ in the human form, has a corresponding indwelling spiritual organ which is immortal.

Our German Cotemporary—Die Tafelrunde (Round Table).

Undoubtedly many of the German Spiritualists in this country are not yet aware, that there is a paper published in their language, devoted to the cause of Spiritualism. This paper is now nearly one year old, and has won many warm friends and well-wishers; it is edited by Dr. P. L. Schucking. Many eminent German scholars contribute to its pages; among others, Dr. Tiedemann of Philadelphia, Hon. Frederic Muench of Missouri, Dr. Cyriax of Cleveland, Dr. Funk of New Orleans, and others. The articles of Dr. Tiedemann on his spiritual experiences, have made quite a sensation, as this Gentleman enjoys a high reputation among his countrymen for scientific attainments, character and veracity, as he formerly belonged to that materialistic school of thought, of which Buckner and Carl Vogt are the representatives.

The Tafelrunde deserves the general support of the liberal Germans. It is published at Washington, D. C, at $2.00 per annum.

Married.

On Thursday evening, April 6th, in Chicago, at the residence of the bride's brother and mother, Mr. JOHN SALEN PHILIPS of Milford, Michigan, and Miss AUGUSTA A. STONE of Chicago, were united in marriage—Hon. S. S. Jones, President of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, officiating.

Benevolent Fund.

Hamilton Pomeroy, 321 President street, Brooklyn, N. Y., sends seventy-five cents to the Benevolent Fund, to aid in sending the JOURNAL to poor widows and orphans, free. Who will follow his example? Small or large sums are gratefully received for that purpose.

Personal and Local.

—Austin Kent reports: "During the past two months I have received from

E. Stone, Texas	$1.00
Mary L. Boothe, Ill.	$1.00
Letta Stowell, Ill.	$2.00
R. L. Kaye, Conn.,	$1.00
Total,	$5.00

Mrs. Kent joins me in thanks to each donor. Also we renew our thanks to all who have sent us aid during the year past. We think if they could fully know how much they have lessened our suffering, they would feel the reward of the charitable. We trust those who are able will remember us during the present year. I am more and more helpless, and require more and more care and cost. Mrs. Kent fails as fast as I do, from the care and burden of me. I most earnestly ask the prayers of all that my earth life may not be too long protracted. Jesus asked that a certain cup—a cruel death—might pass him. It cannot be wrong for me to desire an early release from the cup of my most cruel life. I am both surprised and grateful that my mind stands even, in part, the wreck of my body. In love and good will to all,

A. KENT.

Stockholm, N. Y.

—C. Fannie Allyn has been at Carthage, Missouri The paper published there speaks as follows of her: "The funeral sermon delivered by Miss C. Fannie Allyn, at Regan's Hall, on last Sunday afternoon, was beautiful, grand and touching. The words seemed to fall from the speaker's lips as if by magic, and we confess that we never have heard a sermon that equalled it. She lectured in the evening to one of the largest audiences that ever gathered at that hall."

—A. P. Bowman is lecturing this month in Ocean County, Michigan. The 1st of May will be in Otsego, Mich., where he may be addressed.

—Mrs. A. Romsevelt, writing from Sac City, Iowa, says: "We are 'alone in our glory,' spiritually, in Sac County, about seven miles east of north of Sac City, the county seat, and southwest of Marvin, and southeast of Newell Station, on the Ill. Central R. R.; and hope that some missionary will give us a call, and we will help with our mites to spread the life of eternal love to souls over the fertile plains."

—E. W. Creesey writes from Freeport, Washington Territory, giving an account of the mediumship of Mr. A. A. Cleveland, who, when entranced and lecturing, has been known to quote from over two hundred different authors of whom he knew nothing.

—A prophet reporter in The World, predicts that the empire will be restored in France under the Empress Eugenia. Miss Tennie C. Claflin, the sister of Mrs. Woodhull, a spiritual medium and clairvoyant, has predicted for more than a year past, long before the war, that Louis Napoleon "will have his head cut off in Paris."

—M. D. Conway, the rationalist preacher of London, thinks that, while the dogmas and fables of the Bible render it unfit to be given to the people as a revelation from God, it is nevertheless an invaluable book for those emancipated from Bibliolatry. When the Hebrew mythology is studied rationally, there will be vast treasures of Oriental knowledge derived from it, and such men as Grimm will arise to produce out of it beautiful and significant stories, suitable for old and young, such as we are now getting from Indo-Germanic mythologies.

—Dr. J. K. Bailey recently and unexpectedly returned West, from a successful tour in Poughkeepsie and New York—made us a fraternal call this week. He looks hale, and appears buoyant in spirits. He expects to labor in this state (Ill.) for a time, first starting out along the C. B. and Q. R. R. Give him plenty of work, friends, and especially just remuneration.

—Mrs. A. P. Brown, of St. Johnsbury Centre, Vt., will speak at Swiftwater, Vermont, June 4th. Will officiate at funerals, and answer calls to lecture.

—We learn from Brother S Shirley, that P. R. Lawrence, of Ottumwa, Iowa, has been lecturing at Plum Hollow, some state, with great success. He is represented as being an excellent healer. His efforts awakened great interest.

—The Grand Haven (Mich.) Union, speaks as follows of Miss Pittsinger's recitations:

"Last Thursday evening, Miss Elita A. Pittsinger, the California poetess, gave a series of original and selected recitations to a fine audience at Music Hall. Miss Pittsinger is a poet—a genuine poet. We have seen some of her productions, and read them with much interest; and the original poems she recited Thursday evening, gave evidence of a glowing imagination, correct rhythmical appreciation, and more than ordinary skill in metrical composition."

On the first page of the JOURNAL of April 15th, we presented our readers with one of her poems. We add our testimony to that of thousands of others in saying that she is a poetess of rare genius and depth of power.

—"The Shakers do not worship Ann Lee; never did. They do not worship Jesus; never did. Jesus was a man—a Jewish man was a woman—a Gentile; they were both baptized with the Christ spirit;—this Spirit we worship."—The Shaker.

—Dr. W. H. Bancroft writes from Madison, Wis., in commendation of Mrs. L. Atwood, of Lake Mills. He says: "I have known her for the past ten years, and know that she possesses rare gifts, is well developed, is a good healer, reads character well, and can diagnose disease equal to any medium I ever met. She has treated disease in my family with good results."

—The article entitled, "Remarkable Manifestations," on the sixth page, was written by M. M. Pratt, of Aurora, Ill.

—"We have received one copy of the RELIGIO PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, printed at Chicago. It abounds with gems of thought, and beautiful sentiments."—Harlem, Ill., Flag.

—"Mr. Underwood, an infidel lecturer, was pelted with eggs, and driven off, while holding a meeting in Rivoli Township, Mercer County, on Thursday night of last week."—Ex.

Yes; and that was done by the praying Christians, and had they power, they would have crucified him, or burned him at the stake. The Christians who did this mean act, ought to change places with some of the lowest convicts of Joliet Penitentiary.

BROTHER JONES:—My report for March is as follows: Places visited.—Etna, Granger, Empire, Preston, Nash School House, and Rushford. Number of lectures given, twenty-one. Amount received in dues and collections $40 86. Number joining association, nineteen. Traveling expenses, $8. The last of April I have to defend our faith with a Reverend at Wabasha. Commence lectures in Winona this evening. The cause is in a healthy condition. At every point I find the JOURNAL and BANNER making their weekly visits to cheer the hearts of many a household. Truth will triumph in the end, if we but learn to labor and to wait." The above is respectfully submitted to the Spiritualists of Minnesota.

J. L. POTTER.

Winona, Minn., April 2nd, 1871.

—Many of our mediums and lecturers who visit Louisville, Kentucky, stop at the Spurrier House, where they are made to feel perfectly at home by the liberal minded, genial, whole-souled proprietors.

—Thomas S. A. Pope has removed to Kansas, and has been delivering a course of lectures to the people at Mound City. Long may he live to dispense the gospel.

—Daniel Bonsall, a noble Quaker, residing at Salem, Ohio, writes to us: "The good cause is on the increase here. How I do wish we could have a good test medium visit us—how glad I would be to entertain one."

—Thanks to Brother H. B. Alden, and many others, for sending us trial subscribers. May the angels bless you for the good work.

—Brother Averill writes from Battle Creek, Mich., that the cause is flourishing there.

—F. B. Dowd, the Rosicrucian, is in the lecture field. He is now on his way West. He will make engagements to lecture along the line of the Pittsburg, Fort Wayne and Chicago R. R., and in Northern and Central Illinois, after May 1st.

BROTHER JONES.—I see in the paper an advertisement for spirit pictures taken by Mrs. E. A. Blair. I do not exactly understand the requirements and conditions. I would like a picture of my mother. Cannot send you her autograph now. I might get it, perhaps, but do not know. Please send me your requirements and full particulars, and oblige,

Yours truly,
F. F. BEACH.

La Cygne, Kansas, April 3rd, 1871.

Remarks:—Mrs. Blair does not take likenesses. She executes most beautiful wreaths of flowers, highly ornamental. See advertisement in another column. For spirit artists for taking likenesses, see Medium's Register, and for terms and conditions, see their advertisements in this paper. We have some beautiful specimens of work by spirit artists in our own Reception Room. The public are invited to call and see them.

—"Rosicrucia!" Something new! About to be published, F. B. Dowd's private lectures to ladies and gentlemen on Sexuality. Price 50 cents. For sale at this office. Orders solicited.

—Mrs. M. E. Craig writes: "The JOURNAL is dear to me than ever, since it so nobly lent its strong right arm to defeat that infamous Doctor's bill."

—A mother was amused the other day, to hear the bit of "argument" from her little boy: "Mamma, I don't see how Satan could have tempted us to be such a bad fellow—there wasn't any devil to put him up to it."

Narrative of a Dark Spirit.

By Dr. H. A. Ackley.

NUMBER FOUR.

I am glad to have this opportunity of doing something for you. I have watched with intense interest the conditions of this dark spirit, ever since you first spoke to him, and I desire to present to you what I have witnessed.

You may remember that when I first approached you, years ago, I used very profane language—almost every other word was an oath or obscene word

I shall never forget the objections I am under to you for the kind and gentle manner in which you spoke to me about this habit, which I now perceive to be a low and vile practice, but which I had become so familiar with, that it seemed entirely natural. It was the peculiar manner in which you spoke to me that touched a chord in my soul, and enabled me to break the habit and abandon the practice at once.

Others had spoken to me, and I had sworn more a profane word passed over my lips, and more than that, I have been enabled to overcome profane thoughts, which are the cause of profane words.

It is not, however, to speak of myself, that I have come to you at this time. I am aware that it is extremely difficult to convey to mortals a clear idea of the conditions in which you found this dark spirit, but I shall attempt to explain what we understand by the dark spheres.

The scientific world has discovered the fact that a certain rate of motion in the waves of infinite force, which it calls ether, will produce light, and that each ray constituting a shade or color has its fixed and determined number of vibrations. In order to produce any of the rays of light, these vibrations must be in harmonious, rhythmical and regular waves, and the dark lines which appear upon the spectrum between the various colors of light, are the result of waves that are irregular and not rhythmical. In the dark regions where such undeveloped spirits are compelled by the laws of their being to dwell, all the waves or motions of this ether are of an irregular and inharmonious character, and, hence, no beam or ray of light penetrates the gloom of that stygean pool of impenetrable "outer darkness," where the lowest and most degraded spirits are compelled to grope their way blindly.

They can hear no voice of men or angels to cheer them in their loneliness—only dim and uncertain sounds from their companions in crime, and occasionally a wail from the lower regions of earth-life. No redeeming power reaches them, until some human being moved by the inspirations of divine love, sends forth into that gloom and darkness a sympathetic feeling, which, vibrating upon the chords of these low and degraded human souls, begins the work of reformation and progress for them

When you became conscious of the existence of this spirit, inspired by a deep love of humanity, there went forth from your soul a feeling of sympathy and kindness, accompanied by a desire to help this poor unhappy being, and with that feeling came the means of casting a ray of light into the dark prison-house where this spirit was bound in chains of ignorance and crime. Soon there was revealed to you, through these faint gleams of light, a vision, partially representing the condition of this poor spirit. I say partially, for a true conception of it will never be realized by any one but himself. Such a consciousness as you had of this can only be given to those who are willing to bear some of the burdens of a fellow spirit, and with strong, faithful, earnest love, will go down into the depths of the hells, to minister to spirits in prison.

When God said, "Let there be light," upon your earth, his ministering spirits, departed human beings from other worlds—imbued with a knowledge of the laws of harmony—inspired with a divine impulse, came here and set in motion around our earth, those harmonious waves which produce first the dim light of the primeval periods, and afterwards, as the globe itself progressed, and the power increased brighter and still brighter, light was ushered in until man came to dwell upon the earth.

Such is a portion of the history of every globe, and all over the material universe to-day, there are spirits guided and impelled by the diviner impulses of the higher spheres of life and love, who are thus working upon the material plane.

It is thus that God ever produces, through his mediums and ministering spirits the wondrous works of nature that are manifest to you. So, too, in the dark regions, those gloomy worlds of outer darkness, into which no ray of light can penetrate, these are the results of inharmonious conditions, made more so by low and undeveloped individual spirits. It does not depend upon locality, though these conditions are found mostly, as we have said, in dens and caves, and the lower planes of earth, where foul and pestilential airs abound. The law of music or harmony runs through all nature's modes of progression, and whenever an individual human spirit becomes inharmonious and discordant, so that no musical notes can flow out from them, then gloom envelops them, and all within them is darkened. A dark magnetism, as you term it, and perhaps that will express the idea as well as any thing, envelops and extends around them. While those who come into all within is harmony and purity, a light surrounds them; thus hell and heaven, darkness and light are ever the results of spiritual causes operating through individualized human beings or spirits.

And the magnificent glory which shines out upon the mountain peaks of the Summer Land in beauty, is reflected there from God our Father, by pure and holy spirits. While the darkness and gloom which marks the lower regions, as we term them, are alike reflections from the same infinite and pure Being—distorted by the present inharmony of the mediums through whom it passes.

You have compared the human spirit to carbon, and it illustrates this point most beautifully. The crude and irregular masses of carbon in the black and unsightly coal, is the type of these dark spirits, while that magnificent gem of beauty, the diamond, which is the same element, carbon, in its pure crystalline condition, represents the purest and most harmoniously developed of human spirits. The former in chaos and inharmony, and consequent darkness,—the latter in beautiful and divine order, which is heaven's first law, and it is thus enabled to reflect in the most perfect manner the pure light of heaven.

The process of change may be illustrated by a description of your friend. When you first saw him, he was not at all conscious of your presence. There was a feeling, which can never be lost by any soul under any conditions, that there are spirits somewhere who are better than themselves, and others who are worse, and that there are influences passing from these to them. It is this feeling which gives the idea of good and evil,—simply by the impressions that the spirit receives and in these very low conditions, the best influences, producing as they do unpleasant impressions, are always considered evil, while those which come from spirits on, or near, the same plane, and which produce but little effect in any way, are considered good. Hence, the standard of right and wrong which is in each human soul must be very imperfect. It, however, influences the condition of the spirit. When you first saw him around the young woman, and even when he went away into that dark ovenlike place, which is simply a representative condition of the bondage of such a spirit, he had a sense of your presence, which made him uncomfortable, still he had no consciousness of who you were, or what was your condition. When he spoke to that shut him into that cell, promised that you might have an opportunity with him elsewhere, the dark spirit was not aware of it, but there are positive and negative conditions all the way down the scale of life, and this spirit, though in a very low place, was positive to Antonio, and so he was enabled to bring about this meeting. I was present with you on that occasion, and there were many other spirits there, for it remains to be a truth that "there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth, than over ninety and nine just persons, who need no repentance."

The first ray of light that penetrated that dark soul, was reflected by him in the expression, "I have suffered all that I can, and there can be no condition worse than that in which I now am. I will try." Joy beamed upon the countenances of all the spirits around as they heard these words. We knew that it was the beginning of a grand work that must now go on.

a foundation for more. Those were spirits who had guided him to that place where your spirit and ours met him, and where many of the darkened influences which had hitherto surrounded him could not come, and those spirits joined their influences with ours to lead him away from these dark haunts which he had so long occupied.

The first change in his spirit was to a passive condition, almost reckless and indifferent. This was one step, however. The greatest care was required at this time not to excite him, and wise spirits were there, ready to aid those who were in immediate connection with him.

Faint and feeble were the rays of light that fell across his pathway, for those eyes that so long had been shrouded in darkness that they could not bear the light. Time here, as with you, is an essential ingredient in all reformations, which are always growths.

The spirits around this brother had a desire that he should profess a rapid conversion. They knew that true growth must be slow and in such cases very painful, and that it would require much care and close watching, to bring this tender, fragile plant of darkness out into the clear sunlight of heaven. Slowly and by careful and loving instructions, they have permitted ray after ray of light to penetrate his darkened mansion, and one by one the chains of passion and lust are falling from him.

In the great work of regeneration, it is necessary that spirits draw from the spheres of human magnetism those forces which are essential for this growth and unfoldment of the spirit. The conditions have thus far progressed very satisfactorily. The friends now feel assured that he has started onward in his career of progress, and has taken the important step which leads him to desire to "cease to do evil," and they know that through the ages that are before him, he will be enabled to "learn to do well."

Obituary.

PASSED AWAY, at the residence of his brother-in-law, George H. Gleason, North Haverhill, N. H., March 22d, Franklin J. Hurlburt, aged 45 years, 9 months, after a long and distressing disease of the throat. He bore his suffering with great patience, often suffering keenly from hunger not being able to swallow near what his wasting system required.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

SPEAKERS' AND MASS CONVENTION.

As Chairman of the Committee appointed by the Northwestern Speakers' Association, I am requested to call a Speakers' and Mass Convention, to be held at Smith's Opera House, Decatur, Illinois, on the 2d, 3d, and 4th days of June, 1871; to commence its first session on Friday, June 2d, at 10 o'clock A. M.; and to continue them for the three days as directed by the Convention.

This Association has commenced a series of meetings to gradually change the good social conventions that have long found many good homes for worn, wearied, and sick mediums and speakers, to good social science conventions, to establish the rules by which all faithful workers in the cause of truth will receive a just support. Such progress is necessary, in this transition period of religious associations, from the theological to the scientific, and from the rule of the Christian priests of earth, licensed by man, to that of the angels of heaven, through mediums licensed by the laws of God.

This Convention is called to continue the progressive work of the Association, to establish the order and love of the angels in heaven, among the people of the earth.

Invitation is extended to all to be present. Those who attend will receive a cordial reception by the Spiritualists and their friends in Decatur.

Persons wishing special information about this entertainment of speakers and others, will address the Secretary of the Committee of Reception, H. Righter, Box 290 Decatur, Ill.

By request of Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson, Moses Hull, D. W. Hull, Harvey A. Jones, Dr. Samuel Underhill, and Addie L. Ballou.

MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD.

Healing Medium,

successful Healer the past fifteen years. We rely entirely on the controlling influences. We diagnose and give prescriptions by letter. Distance no objection. Will visit in person a reasonable distance those that desire, and can afford the expense. Delineation and advice in a variety of ways. Emblems we give gratuitously to all our patients, when presented by our guides. Our former custom has been to come en rapport with the applicant by the hand-writing or lock of hair; but to save time, and the unpleasant sensation of taking on the symptoms of the disease, we require the applicant to give age and sex, with one or two leading symptoms of the disease, written by the patient, if able to write—if not, send lock of hair. As the giving of tests is not the object which we seek, but to restore the patient to health by Nature's own hand, in the shortest time possible, we do not deem it necessary here to lumber up an advertisement with what we have done or what we can do, but prefer to be known by our fruits.

Terms, for diagnosis and prescription, $2; Diagnosis without prescription, $1; all subsequent prescriptions, $1 each. All letters should be accompanied with the fee, and addressed to MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD, Box 15, Lake Mills, Jefferson Co., Wis.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium.

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

MRS. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

Mrs. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well when the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms—Diagnosis and first prescription, $3.00: each subsequent, $2.00: Psychometric Delineation of character, $1: answering Business Letters, $3. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

MRS. M. I. SHERMAN,

PSYCHOMETRIST.

Persons sending photograph, lock of hair, date of birth, whether single or married, with stamps, will receive delineation of character, including leading events in past and future life, for two dollars. Diagnosis of disease, and prescription, or instructions for mediumistic development.

WHAT EVIDENCE HAVE WE THAT SPIRITS COMMUNICATE?

A Lecture, Delivered by Mrs. E. A. Williams, at Stark's Hall, Williamson, N. Y., Friday Evening, Mar. 17, 1871.

[Reported expressly for the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.]

A large and attentive audience gathered, although the weather was unfavorable, at the above mentioned place, to listen to the inspirational speaker, Mrs. E. A. Williams, of Danville, N. Y., upon the above subject, which was selected by the audience. The meeting was opened with an invocation, after which the subject was announced, and the lecture given.

INVOCATION.

Almighty Father and Creator, Thou Great Designer and Unfolder of the Universe, our Father and our Mother, unto Thee we would direct our thoughts and prayers, our praises and thanks, this evening. We thank Thee that we are kindly permitted to meet with these, Thy children, and to express our thoughts to them—that we can elevate them; that we can do naught or say naught that will elevate Thee, but we feel it a necessity of our nature to approach Thee this evening for strength. We ask Thee to guide us, to instruct and to enlighten our minds; may a shower of holiness from the spheres above, shed its light around, and may we speak words of wisdom and truth, may we help to lead some mind upward this evening, and sow the seed that shall bring forth fruit in the garden above. We ask it for the sake of humanity. Amen.

LECTURE.

Our friend would have us take for our text, this evening, the evidences that we have that disembodied spirits communicate with those that are still dwellers within the human form. There are many manifestations contained in the Bible, that we rehearsed the other evening that are true if anything within that book is true, and if there ever was a communication from the angel world to the mundane sphere, there must be evidence of it; all along there must be a line that extends through the past up to the present. You remember, my friends, the first evening we spoke here, that we related instances from the Bible, where spirits had manifested themselves to their brethren in the flesh. Now we will speak of the manifestations of the nineteenth century. We can relate some instances in our own career, since we first began to manifest our powers through the organization of this medium.

We find, in the first place, that we can sometimes personate, sometimes describe, and when she was first developed, we could communicate by the tiny rap, the tipping of the table, and at a period when she had but one more developed, we found that we could communicate by moving the hand. Now, says our friend, give us evidence that spirits actually communicate with mortals.

In order, my friend, to give you evidence [to the proposer of the subject], you must have a personal test. Mankind too long have dwelt on theories; mankind too long have looked to their teachers; they have too long been led like children, and the time has come when the sons of humanity must stand firm and true, and investigate for themselves. We love to hear you say, "Give us some more evidence," for when there is a true demand, there shall come a supply. In our land there are scattered broadcast mediumistic minds, each one possessing, as it were, a different gift. As there are different manifestations, we find there are different mediums adapted to give those manifestations. In Rochester, first, there was the tiny rap; it was despised, it was hooted at—yea, men tried to hide the innocent down with names unfit to be spoken in public. But the raps still continue. Men with noble minds, men of brains, men of energy, scientific men, step forward to investigate the matter—did they themselves make the rap? if so, how, and by what means? No one could detect the fraud, and now, is there one here who will own that these women, uneducated and illiterate, could so far deceive them?

If we are to take the evidence of the past, if we are to rely upon the word of St. Peter, or St Paul, Matthew, Mark, Luke or John, we also may rely upon the testimony of men that live in the present day. You have no acquaintance with Matthew, Mark, Luke or John, except that which you have gained by reading, that which you have gained through history. But of the men of the present day that have given their experiences, you may know something concerning their ability, their early surroundings, their moral standing,—whether they are truthful or not. Now then, if we are to believe a say-so, we may as well believe the man that says a thing to-day, as the man that said it in the past; and we have just as good evidence that spirits communicate to-day as we have that they communicated in the past. There is Judge Edmonds, of New York City, a man of spotless character, known and respected in our courts of justice, looked up to as an honest man, who has thrown in his evidence. He says:

"Verily, spirits do communicate with mortals. I have beheld my sainted wife; I have seen my spirit son; I have beheld him in the arms of his spirit mother, and she has told me that she waiteth for me on the other shore."

If, then, you can believe St. Paul and St. Peter whom you have not seen, and of whom you only have a record some eighteen hundred years old, may you not also receive the testimony of one who is honorable and manly, who has influence in society? Then we have one evidence that spirits do communicate. Again, Prof. Hare starts out, full of energy and fire, as it were, to search out and annihilate this deception—it is built upon naught! Behold, he is brought to a stand! He says:

"I am convinced that the Angel World can manifest itself to the mundane sphere."

He writes a book upon the subject, and comes as a witness for the angel world. What benefit would it have been to Prof. Hare to have told an untruth, to have upheld a dangerous doctrine, one that was going to destroy the Bible, as we are told, one that was going to bring the churches down, one that was going to tear the platform from under the truths that had stood firm as the everlasting rocks for years and years? Surely none. He stands up bravely like a man. He has been, as it were, guided by the angel hosts above. He stands firm and true. "I will be a man; I will confess to God; I will confess the wisdom of the angels; I know they guide, I know they protect, I know they have power to direct."

On a little further, and I find a boy, some fourteen years of age, who had never attended school over three months in his life, being influenced, first, by animal magnetism by a certain doctor, and now he beholds him, as it were, traversing the starry heavens above us, through clime after clime, and telling what he sees. Pretty soon he has outgrown this, and is beyond the doctor's influence; so he leaves him, and another magnetizer takes him, but in a little while he has outgrown the influence of the last one also. Now he may depend upon his own clairvoyant powers, open the spiritual spheres, and behold, as it were, the source of the magnetic stream that flows upon him, that had brought him up to his present plane of development—I am illuminated, I can look backward and read the history of the past. I can look forward, judging from the past and present, and perceive something of the grand, great, and glorious future."

Then you see that there are those in our day, who are in a state of clairvoyance at times, corresponding to the state of clairvoyance of St. John and others of olden time. If these things ever existed here, may they not exist in our day? But let us give some of our own experience.

This medium, a little over a year ago, was at Painsville, N. Y. A few pleasant friends gathered at the house of Friend Cuyler, the medium never having but once before met Mr. Cuyler or his wife, and all the other friends gathered there were entire strangers to her. Nothing had been said before her of Mr. Cuyler having lost friends. They beheld the manifestations there, the little granddaughter, the light of the house, the living sprig that had been plucked, as it were, from the parental stem and carried away on the wings of angels—she arises. "Ah!" says the influence, using these mediumistic lips, "little Birdie is present, little Birdie is here!" How did she know the name of the angel child? No one had told it her, by no one had told how she looked. Did she not see the form? Was not the spirit present there? A little incident was told.

"Don't you remember when you and I and grandmother, were riding together, how Dollie's hat fell off, and how you wouldn't get it for me?"

Enough was said to convince the grandfather that the child was present—a powerful test. "My bird is here; Birdie liveth!"

Another. We find Mr. Throop in the circle, and describe his angel wife. The next day he brings a portrait of the lady to the store of Mr. Lacy and it is handed to a second gentleman, by whom it was brought to the medium.

"Have you ever seen a face like this, my friend?" says he.

"Why, yes; that is the lady I saw standing by that old gentleman last night."

And then, Mr. Todd is at the circle. He had, it seems, an old and decrepit mother or grandmother, we will not be sure which, who had passed to the spirit world, who stood near him with her crumpled hands; she held them up. "Ah!" says he, "that is her." Some more characteristics were given, sufficient to satisfy him that that dear friend of his was present there.

Now, perhaps to some of you this evidence would not be sufficient to convince you of their presence. But evidence after evidence has been added, until this grand theory has as firm a platform as can be,—as firm as truth itself. This truth has been manifested until the scientific mind yields to-day, and bows with submissive head, and confesses that it is strange, and grand, and true.

Another instance happened at Chicago. We can't give the names here, but we can recite the circumstances.

A mother, it seems, came to the circle. We inquired for her child, she wishes to be brought en rapport with the little daughter; she is a stranger there. She comes again the second time, and gives her name, and a third time she tells them she has found her little daughter, tells them where she is, how her little daughter looks, tells the name of her town, in what county the protectors of her child dwells. One of the friends present determined to search her out. The next paper announces that he has found the child; and oh! these things are true!

Some five years ago, my friends, we went into the little village of Copenhagen; there was a gentleman named Monroe, a confirmed Infidel, present at a little seance; some little manifestations were given. He was so much interested that he came again, and his son, and finally himself, and gives so many characteristics that the tears start from the father's eyes and roll down the cheeks. He cries, "My God! I thank Thee! I know I shall live! My son liveth, and I know I shall!"

Here, then, is another evidence that the spirits of men not only live in a world beyond, but that they actually have the power to communicate their thoughts to the ones they have left behind. But, say you, if they can communicate their thoughts, why can they not communicate them directly to me, instead of through a mediator? What is the necessity of mediums? If I could see them standing by my side, says the skeptic, I then should believe. But, my friends, it is a law decreed by nature; there are those who are subject to spiritual magnetic influences, and those who are subject to animal magnetism, and there are subjects the operator can magnetize, and others that he can not approach.

Now, what is the so-called spiritual manifestation? Is it really animal magnetism, or is it a spiritual communication—one spirit communicating with another? Is it the fluid or substance that flows from the animal hand, or does mind act upon mind?

The operator that has once psychologized or magnetized a subject, and brought him in perfect rapport with himself, if conditioned aright, impresses his thoughts upon the subject without coming in contact with said subject. If this be so, it is mind over mind; and, if it is mind over mind, there, it is mind over mind when spirits return and manifest themselves.

Spirits can not operate over all; it is only the negative mind that can be made subject to the will—I see that the spirit throws upon it,—consequently we find that there is a necessity sometimes for the third person, that the communication must come through mediumistic lips. As well might the investigator say, "There is no use for Bell to send a message, we can get it ourselves, old, may you not also receive the testimony of one who is honorable and manly, who has influence in society? Then we have one evidence that spirits do communicate. Again, Prof. Hare starts out, full of energy and fire, as it were, to search out and annihilate this deception—it is built upon naught! I can look forward, judging from the past and present, and perceive something of the grand, great, and glorious future."

Would this be reasonable, when we behold man developing every day until he has come to stand upon a higher plane than he ever stood before? Now, his demands are greater, and oh! from whence shall come the mighty supply, if not from the servants of the living God? And who are angels? We are told in the Bible that they are the spirits, just men made perfect. Then, who will be drawn around you, if not your earthly friends? If not those whom you love, those who are attracted to you? Who are attracted to you here? It is your own family—your own friends and early associates that are the dearest. The golden gate has been opened, while you and they come to dwell in the same sphere; but one has passed on to a higher sphere. Say you the chord is severed? No, no! You can not follow them through the grave, or feel content that they are no more. You say there is a hope within, that I shall meet them sometime in the future. Why this hope? Why is the mother taught to love her babe? Why so naturally does she say I will meet my little jewel in heaven? Why those natural ties implanted within your being, so strong? And yet your little buds dwell but a few months in your hearts; your sympathies have learned to twine around them, and every chord of their life seems to be interwoven with yours, when the angel of death comes and takes them away, the cold grave opens to receive them. Would it not be unjust for the Creator to bring these objects of your tenderest care and sympathy into being, and then take them away from your sight with no hopes of your ever meeting them again? No! The human heart rebels at such a thought. The human sympathies cry out, "It can not be so! They are flying still."

As another illustration, you will find that the most savage races, the most heathen nations, have some idea of a spirit.

Now, from whence came this idea, if not from the great Central Sun of divine light,—if God Almighty himself has not planted it there with the fiery fingers of truth, whence came it? Not from the Bible, because they have never read it. It is a natural instinct of their spirit.

Besides this idea of spirit, we find tribes of Indians that believe their "sainted ones" come and enjoy their feasts with them. Where did they get this idea from? Child of Nature! uncultivated, uncouth in thy appearance, thou hast not yet learned to be false to thy trust and highest convictions; thou hast not yet learned to deny thy Father, God, with his holy manifestations. When he sends the angel host to thee, speaking in tones of truth and purity thy soul cries aloud, and recognizes the grand truth for itself!

And now, my friends, if you have not sufficient proof of the truthfulness of Modern Spiritualism, I will say to you as one of old said to his friends: "Go and consult with the prophets!" In other words, go to the telegraph office where the messages are received, and if the telegrapher does not understand his business, do not be discouraged and say: "Well, they are full-fledged. I suppose they belong to the full-grown mediums,—prophets of the Most High God! Remember that in this line of progression, it may take years for a mind that may yet receive a communication from the angel world, to be developed up to where communications may become perfect. In alluding to last night's evening, we said it was like water, it partakes more or less of the soil through which it flows. You cannot say but that water is a pure element, but if it runs through a mucky soil it becomes colored, notwithstanding it is an element of purity. Now, then, if, perchance, a well developed spirit may take possession of an undeveloped mind, its thoughts will partake more or less of the medium through which they come, and perhaps the ideas will not come in quite so grammatical a form. But never mind, the corn from the spirit-world is plucked for you and brought by angel hands; no matter if there are husks on it, they only grow there, and it is for you to strip them off. You need not eat the cobs and husks with the corn, but remove them and throw them away, and if necessary, grind the corn and sift it with reason, taking only that which is nutritious to you; but be careful that you do not throw away the corn with the husks; be careful you do not condemn before you investigate so glorious a phenomena as angelic communion. We find the scriptures full of spirit manifestations; but, ladies and gentlemen, the question is asked, what is the necessity of their coming, if immortality was demonstrated eighteen hundred years ago? We say to you that there are those who cannot receive the Bible testimony, because their Hope is small and their Caution large, because they cannot believe anything until it is demonstrated to them. Should our Father neglect them, should He neglect to feed his children when the cry ascendeth upward, "Father! give us this day our daily bread? Let us from the heavenly fountain be fed! We are thirsty; Oh! give us water that is pure, give us the water of truth to quench this burning thirst. Now, is it? It was not to those who were well that the physician of old came, but to the sick. If you are satisfied in your synagogues with your high priests and sacrifices, stay there. But there are those outside of the church who must be called in; they have heard the voices of the angel world, and are satisfied that they are true. They have been redeemed through a consciousness of the presence of their dear angel friends. The drunkard says if my little innocent child can see me take this glass, I will drink no more. Says the father, who has been left with an orphan child, if my sainted wife can see me, I will take good care of the little one. Says the step-mother, if the angel mother is present with the child, I won't abuse it. For another evidence, we find an incident related in the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL of a little child a year old, which had been given previous to its mother's death, to a very dear friend to bring up. The father after a while gets married and takes the child away from this friend and brings it home. It is left alone in the cradle one day, when, all at once, it is taken and laid on the bed. No one is in the room. The step-mother enters the room, and finds the little one laughing in its innocent glee and says, "How came you on the bed?" "Mamma placed me there." Who had taught that little one to lisp, "Mamma." Who had taught it to know "Mamma," for, and yet but a day old when mamma left it? Who had taught it but the angel mother? Who had conveyed it to the bed but the angel mother? Afterwards the child was replaced under the care of the mother's friend. Is not this circumstance an evidence that the angel mother was present with her child to love, to care, and to protect it through the tender bud through the storms of life? Many manifestations like this in the nineteenth century are given; and can we reasonably doubt them, can we doubt that there is a grand truth in the midst of it all? To be sure, my friends, you will find error and truth mixed together; you will find wheat and tares growing in the same field, but you need only take wheat, that which is proven to be true in your investigations, and you will find plenty of evidence that spirits do communicate now as of old, and that, too, through the same source, except that then they were called prophets and seers, while to-day they are called mediums and clairvoyants.

Now, my friends, do you want any further proof of spiritual existence? If you believe the Bible you do not; but if you do not believe the Bible, and need something more, you must search within your own spirit. For example: I will remove you to some foreign land, to some sunny isle beyond the sea. Everything shall be beautiful. You shall have society and friends, and everything you desire, but you shall leave the friends you have love the most, your family and; and oh! what will be your reply? "I will give all up for one letter from home! Give me a letter from home, and I will dwell in the woods, I will dwell beneath the cloth tent, I will dwell in the shanty, I will eat the coarsest bread. Oh! give me a letter from home!"

We are told by the instructor Jesus, that "the kingdom of heaven is within you;" in other terms, that your happiness depends upon the condition of your mind; and if your mind is loving, kind, and affectionate, you will be drawn out toward your friends, and should you be separated from them, you have no heaven—there would be no happiness for you. You may behold all the manifestations of nature—the beautiful flowers, the rising sun—all the grand scenteries that you have loved—but if the greatest gift of all that God has bestowed upon you has been taken away, all the rest is "vanity of vanities and vexation of spirit!" So I say, here is an evidence within your own soul, that spirits can communicate. There is a demand,—you want to hear from your friends on the other side.

"Ah!" says the Christian, "if I thought my friends were around me, I should suppose they would be most miserable. I am sure I would be unhappy if I were removed to a sphere above this, and should see all this sin and misery going on below."

Friends, what gives you happiness when your dearest friend lies upon the bed of sickness? Is it not the assistance you can render them, the sympathy and love, that brings you happiness? Do you suppose you have all at once grown selfish because you are called on to a higher life? Do you suppose you have lost the best gift of all because you have changed your higher plane? Oh, no! it can not be so, you reply; I want to speak to them, to guide them through the turmoil of life, and help them on to a higher sphere.

Behold, my friends, the telegraph extends from one sphere to the other, and the dear ones that the telegraph to you only will. Now, friends, if this is true, that your friends are around you, and can actually communicate to you, are you not happy in the thought? If not, —if you are not happy in the thought,—verily, I say unto you, you are a dark spirit, and you don't want the light too near, lest it reveal your misdoings. Your affections are very weak, the natural ties that bind you to your friends are not strong.

[The lecturer closed with a poem, the main idea of which was, that angels were drawn by the chords of sympathy and love to the mundane sphere, to guide and care for their dear ones left behind.]

REMARKABLE MANIFESTATIONS.

Spirits Join in Singing—No Charges Made at the Seance.

In the JOURNAL of April 1st, I saw an account of spirit manifestations at Moravia, New York, all of which I firmly believe to be true, having witnessed like manifestations in October last some time—I do not remember date. I heard of these manifestations while on a visit to Syracuse, and as I had friends in Auburn, I determined to go to Moravia and there ask, if, if not, and found, on inquiry, that the medium was still at Mr. Keeler's. On my arrival at his house, I was welcomed by the old lady and gentleman, and supper was prepared in less time than it takes to write. After supper, I was invited into a room kept expressly for the accommodation of those who may take the trouble to go there. A bay window was partitioned off for a cabinet, which we examined, and found no chance for deception. As there were only newspapers pinned over them to exclude the light,—we formed a half circle in front of the cabinet, which had an aperture a foot or more square, with a black curtain hung over upon the inside. The medium sat under the curtain, and outside the cabinet. When the old lady asked if they should put out the light, three raps came, and it was extinguished. After waiting a few minutes, lights appeared in various directions, about six or three inches long, like tapers of various colors, silvery and rainbow tints, and were most beautiful. Questions were asked, and answered by three lights for yes, and one for no.

Singing being called for, the medium took a seat inside the cabinet, near one end, where the door was placed, and which, on being closed, a hand and arm appeared as if to recognize me. I then waved no, and then waved three times toward me. I got the impression that it was a daughter of Dr. Maxson, of Scott, New York, and asked, "Is it Mary?" when three waves of the hand indicated the response.

I then said, "If it is you, Mary, please show both hands," when another was presented, both having narrow, white baby's hands about them, and a face similar to the dress she was buried in; for she was buried in a bridal dress, with a child on her arm. A baby's hand was then shown, and of course I thought it was hers. After others had called over names, the baby's hand pointed to me, and I said, "Is it Mary's baby?" when a loud rap indicated no. Then I said, "Is it my child?" and three raps came for yes.

Then my father's hand was plainly shown, and next, a spirit talked and lectured through the trumpet. Previous to this, another lady's hand was shown, a little larger than the first, only like it, and purported to be Mary's mother. Then a small hand like my mother's. I said, "If it is mother, show your face, if possible," and a face was immediately presented. I did not see it distinctly, as I was sitting at one end of the circle, but the medium described my mother perfectly.

Then a trumpet was used, and we could hear loud breathing, and then a voice, saying:

"My child, I came to this world an unbeliever in this philosophy, but am now forced to believe, and how sorry I am that I shut my mind against the light."

Then I was told of things which occurred in my family previous to my going East. This was done with labored breath, as though it was very hard work to talk. Then, in the same tone, "Sweet Home" was called for, which we sang, when several voices seemed to join and sing loudly. Then I sang a favorite of mine, as it was sung at my child's funeral:

"shall we gather at the river," etc., when immediately voices joined me, keeping perfect time, and then were heard in chorus:

"Yes; we will gather at the river," they emphasized yes, and sang very loud, as though there were at least a half dozen voices.

Other tests were given for other members. A hand was recognized.

The old gentleman told me that he expected to be able to sit down and talk face to face with them before he died. The medium is an unsophisticated Irish girl, brought up by the family. They are farmers, and charge nothing for their trouble—poor pay if it is deception.

ADDRESS TO SPIRITUALISTS.

At a meeting of the board of Trustees of the American Association of Spiritualists, held in Philadelphia, March 10th, 1871, the undersigned were appointed to prepare an address appealing for the means of prosecuting the missionary labors of the society. Our associates, therefore, together in the hope of doing more good by combining our efforts, not in the spirit of limitation or dogmatism, finds itself few in numbers compared with the whole body of earnest Spiritualists, and with limited means.

We would say to all Spiritualists, friends, will you not contribute to aid this society? At the present time, more than ever, the necessity of securing the services of Eli F. Brown and others, competent and willing missionaries, who would undertake the establishing of Lyceums, and the spread of the cause of Spiritualism, but we have not the funds to place them in the field, hence it is that we appeal to Spiritualists for assistance.

We know that there are those who do not favor organization, even to the limited extent of promoting missionary labors. We will not ask that those contributing shall believe in organization, but we do ask true earnest Spiritualists, whether they approve or disapprove of organization, to give as their aid. The Association could do much if those interested would so operate by forwarding the fund set apart for the general purpose of spreading the knowledge of the presence and influence of spirits. Our fund is necessarily too small for the vast field of labor that invites us. Surely there can be no difference of opinion as to the desirableness of spreading the truth in our possession as Spiritualists; for it is not ours alone, truth being the most precious belongings of all humanity. We do not lessen our own stores when we impart ideas or spiritual wealth to others, for the law that underlies a spread of knowledge of spiritual facts and spiritual experiences, is not a law of division and decrease, but of multiplication and increase. Humanity is always richer, while not one individual is poorer for this distribution.

We therefore solicit the assistance of Spiritualists generally, that we may be able to raise a fund sufficient to put laborers into the field, and distribute the benefits of progressive thought into localities where our numbers are yet few, at to institute lyceums where the truths of a rational, soul-revealing, soul satisfying philosophy can be brought to the minds of the young.

Active workers in Spiritualism, you who have accepted its soul cheering truths, will you not aid us? Spiritualists in every locality, if you love the things of the spirit, let the breath of this comforter infuse into your minds a generous sympathy for those on whom the mantle of our bright faith, our knowledge, has not yet fallen. We may wish, hope and pray, but we must coin these wishes, hopes and prayers into material aid and missionary efforts, in order to make them reach the needs of humanity.

Shall not individual aspiration be strengthened by wafting the loving messages of spirits to homes that would otherwise be left in doubt and drear? On the other side of the river, behind the curtain that veils the spirit world, are bands of willing, earnest workers. We are the recipients of their [illegible] us also be dispensers of their gifts,—in [illegible]wing the power for good which lies in [illegible]trople mind that has [illegible]ritual Philosophy, to [illegible]illumination.

All contributions will be useful and acceptable, and may be directed to the address of any member of the Board, or to the Secretary, Henry T. Child, M. D., at 634 Race street, Philadelphia, who will forward them to the Treasurer.

Funds will be carefully applied to the purposes suggested by the contributors.

CAN THE SPIRIT LEAVE THE BODY?

By W. Hicks.

In your number of March 18th, 1871, in a communication from Bro. H. H. Smith, he says, "There are instances on record and spoken of by many, to go to prove the fact that spirits leave the form, and travel about, and go back and take possession of the body again, and the body still holds its living position; but there are certain reasons that can be given to show the contrary."

Now, Brother Jones, I am not in the habit of writing for the press, nor do I feel competent to do justice to the subject; but I would like Brother Smith to explain a few things which I deem facts. I will give them and leave others to judge.

About ten years ago, we were holding a circle at the house of Brother Duffee, in this place, and after sitting for about one hour, there was an intermission, during which I left the house and went away for a time. While I was absent in the physical form, there being present some eight or ten persons in the circle room, they all testified that they saw me come into the room by tipping the outside door open, shutting it again, and I passed through the room into another, which had no place of getting out again without my coming back into the circle room. My wife followed me into the room, but when she got there, I was not to be seen. While they were wondering where I was, I came into the room from the other door.

Now I was not conscious of any part of myself being absent at the time. I was conscious that I was in my physical body all the time I was absent from the circle.

Now I ask, has a man two bodies,—one physical and the other spiritual,—and can the latter leave under proper conditions, and both be conscious? or, if not, is the spiritual, or physical, is not? and, if the physical is conscious, the spiritual is not? Now, I ask these questions to see if there are others that have had similar experience.

I think I know as well as man can know anything, if it is possible for me to know anything, that I have been hundreds of miles away from my physical body, and I was perfectly conscious at the time, and talked about it and wondered at it, that it was so far away from my body, but I was going back to it and take possession of it again.

Now if this is a fact, which it is to me, I would say to Brother Smith, that I still live in the physical form.

If Brother Smith, it is facts we are after, and not theories, and I believe that is what you are after. There are laws governing the spirit, that are not found out as yet,—and we must not claim that we have got at all truth. I know that mesmerism, psychology, clairvoyance, psychometry, explain much, but as understood, do not explain everything to my mind, and as I am in search of light, I hope I may get it through the JOURNAL, as I consider it a philosophical journal, as it purports to be.

DO SPIRITS WEEP?

By George Haskell.

The following incident is worthy of record, and may serve to illustrate the inquiry, do spirits weep? On the evening of Feb. 4th, 1871, our circle had been favored with visits from several spirits, and had conversed with them; they speaking in their own voice through the trumpet, and answering such inquiries as we were prompted to make. After six different spirits had thus talked with us, another spirit took the trumpet, and said:

"Good evening, friends. I am J. Wilkes Booth, the assasin of Lincoln. Am very miserable, and have been ever since I committed that murderous deed. I am receiving the just recompense of that rash act."

I asked if we could do anything for him. He replied:

"No; I must suffer and outgrow the consequences of what I have done. I am reconciled to Lincoln, and he would do anything in his power to assist me."

Then in a forcible, theatrical style, he rehearsed a passage from Shakespeare, peculiarly applicable to his own condition, "I would a tale unfold," etc.

When he had finished the passage, he said, "I must now go. Farewell."

Another spirit attempted to speak through the trumpet, but could not succeed. On striking a light the name John Brown was found written on the paper, and several drops, apparently of water, were on the paper. There was no water in the room, and had not been for several weeks. On inquiry of the spirits we were told that what we found on the paper were Booth's tears—that he felt so bad he could not help weeping. The same law that could enable spirits to materialize hands to hold the trumpet, and organs to speak with, could use the elements for other purposes, and tears could be produced and thus manifested.

Discussion Between E. V. Wilson and Rev. Clark Braden.

[Notes taken during a Discussion on the Resolution,—"Resolved, That the Bible, King James' Version, sustains Modern Spiritualism in all its Phases and Teachings."]

E. V. WILSON affirms.—REV. CLARK BRADEN denies.

SUMMING UP OF MR. WILSON.

One other position of my friend, however; requires close attention. It is this:

1st.—Can the embodied spirit do these things? Are there any limits to the spirit of man in the body? Who can limit the power of the spirit in the body?

This, in fact, is the only important position assumed by Mr. Braden, and he has continually sought to prove this one point. It is his pivotal centre during the discussion of both resolutions. But where is his proof? Oh! I have cited the case of my father when insane, the Jerkers barking at the devil, the Methodists treading down. Did you see these things, Mr. Braden? Oh, no; I have only heard of it. Have you any letters from any of these parties who barked at the devil, or treed Jesus? Oh, no—but I heard some body say so. Well, how do you know they did not lie? Can you swear to these things? Here his testimony falls through.

Second position on this great principle of his: If the spirits in the body are capable of infinite possibilities now, they were in the past. If the spirit of the little girl moves two hundred and seventy-five pounds to day, the spirit of Mary and Mary Magdalene rolled the stone from the sepulchre of Jesus. If my spirit lifted me into the air, to day, the spirit of Jesus carried him on the stormy waves of Galilee. And thus, every phenomena of the past is the result of natural, or supernatural, embodied spirits. Who says so? Clark Braden. Proof? I believe. Who? I, Clark Braden. Has he an affidavit, a letter, even a newspaper, let alone well authenticated history, to sustain a single witness?

On the other hand, we have not introduced a single point, statement or fact that we have not backed up by bringing the book, letter, affidavit, newspaper or living witness before the audience, forming a complete chain of testimony, connecting every phase of Spiritualism and our teachings with the spirit's of those who were once men such as we are.

The coarse thrust of Mr. Braden in asking, "are they not all liars, all cheats, all tricksters, jugglers, humbugs? Are they not all insane, all drunkards and imposters?

The coarse insult offered our old Father Lawrence, Dr. Newcomer and David Eddy, each of whom offered to take the stand and be cross-examined by Mr. Braden.

Again, the coarse and vulgar denunciations of the Christian churches as a band of filthy Christianity were uncalled for, foreign to the resolution, and ill timed.

The gospel of Spiritualism throws the mantle of charity over the errors of all, condemning only the sin, not the sinner, and the language of Jesus to the woman of Samaria, "Doth no man condemn thee? And she answered, no man, Lord. Neither do I; go thy way and sin no more."

This charity is the ultimate of all true Spiritualism, and is worthy of the support of the people.

Mr. Braden quoted from the history of England, showing that sixteen thousand witches were executed in one reign, and I questioned, that if the churches had the rule, there would be sixteen thousand Spiritualists hang by the neck on the right hand, and sixteen thousand Campbellites on the left by theft heels, with a bonfire made of sixteen thousand Adventists and Universalists under our feet and heads, smoking the devil out of us—during one presidential administration.

Mr. Chairman, how much time have we?

Mr. Chairman.—Twenty minutes.

Thank you. We will now review, in brief, a few points in this wondrous summing up of his. Taken all together, what is it? A wash bowl full of dirty slop tipped over into the tub of a few dirty Christians, and unto many Spiritualists made pure by the laws of common sense, reason and progression.

1st.—Mr. Braden says, "My friend has frequently referred to the cords of crutches piled up at the Mayo House, belonging to the invalids cured by the humbug, Newton."

Well, this is rich! The facts are, we have never referred to these crutches; but Mr. Braden has frequently done so, and then cited the testimony of letters from every part of the country published in the Chicago Tribune, calling on Newton to refund the money and send them back their crutches. Why do you not tell the whole truth, Mr. Braden?

Dr. Newton, when in Chicago, heated thousands out of the tens of thousands that visited him daily, and we are prepared to produce thousands of certificates to prove our assertion. So much for that splurge.

2d.—Mr. Braden says, "When a chemical phenomena takes place, we would put an expert in chemistry to test it. When a diagnosis of disease is given by a spirit through my friend, I would call in the skilled physician to test the correctness of his statement, and so on, throughout the whole field of spiritual phenomena." "But, my friends, who can trust these wise and scientific men? They are not to be trusted; for of all men, these great wise men are the most gullible creatures in the world. If you want to find sharp, keen, observing, practical fellows, go down into the street amongst the newsboys, and there, among them, you will find the proper persons to detect the frauds of Spiritualism."

Well, well! if there is not a splurge and frand slopped over, we know nothing of language. Yet the doctors, chemists, linguists and lawyers, to expose Spiritualists and detect their tricks, and then call in the newsboys and boot blacks of the city to tell these experts and great men what to do; for of all men in the world these great men are the most willing to be imposed on.

Sir, in heaven's name, why don't you call in yourself and your most intelligent Campbellites, with their steel pens and fifth avenue of knowledge, and the whole thing would "go up in a balloon."

3d.—Mr. Braden says, "The eagerness with which spiritual speakers swallow any bug-a-boo story, as well as the ease with which they are deceived, is simply ridiculous."

Here his fifth wheel runs off an axletree it was never on. Yesterday, "these speakers, seers, healers, mediums, were the greatest rascals, rogues, cheats, humbugs, arrant knaves, impostors in the world, shrewd as the devil, and cunning as the "heathen Chinee" in their wiles and subtleness. Now they are gawkers, playing young robbie opening their mouths and swallowing anything that Braden and company may throw in. There is consistency for you. Well, on second thought, we guess he may be partially right, for did we not come out of a family who read the Arabian nights as miraculous conception, big fish stories, fox-tails, riddles and liars, and the marvelous castle in Spain, the New Jerusalem theory.

4th.—Mr. Braden finds one case he can not trace to the spirit in the body.

We reply, there his whole system tumbles to the ground, and his work is a failure, for on his own ruling, if one case is a fact and can not be traced to the spirit in the body, are not all the cases referred to by him independent of the spirit in the body?

5th.—Mr. Braden says, "Their phenomena is, first, silly and childish; second, absurd; third, ridiculous; fourth, indelicate; fifth, pantheistic. Only think of spirits making chairs dance, blowing on wooden pipes, and shaking tambourines."

Well, we are willing to accept and parallel these charges. What does my friend think of the ram's horn that the spirit of God blew at the walls of Jericho; of the fleece of wool wet by the spirit of God, to please skeptical old Gideon; of the angel that crawled into Jonah's belly and spoke out of his stomach; of the three hundred young men that were made to lap water like dogs; or of Jonah in the belly of a big fish. What of them? Are they not silly and ridiculous?

6th.—Mr. Braden says, "My friend will take this course. He will undertake, as he has done heretofore, to parallel these things from the Bible. It is the insult to the Bible, to God, and to a Bible believing community, to audience, and ought to be resented."

(This produced a faint cheer from the dozen or fifteen Campbellites who were present on compli mentary tickets.)

This is extraordinary. I wonder if the one hundred and fifty or two hundred Spiritualists who have listened to Rev. Braden's bowl full of dirt, eighteenths water, and two-tenths mud, are insulted? Oh, no! of course not. He is talking for Christ's sake, and can't offend. We are talking for humanity, and do offend—who? The complimentaries of his own flock.

7th.—Mr. Braden says, "We confine the phenomena to the embodied spirit, because it belongs there. We admit there is an abnormal condition, a power beyond our understanding."

To this point we reply that in this declaration he has upset every position he has taken; for in the admission that there is an abnormal power beyond his understanding, he admits that he knows nothing about it. Hence he piped an uncertain sound that he does not understand, nor any body else. Another slop over.

8th.—Mr. Braden says, "The papers of which my friends and myself are editors, and for which they write, the one for the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, the other for the American Spiritualist, remind me of the insane journal published by the insane men of Oshkosh in this state, and are just about as worthy of public approval."

To this thrust at the productions of our press, we reply, that the drunken man thinks every body else drunk, and knows that he is sober, and the insane man believes he is sane, and every body else mad, and as insanity is catching in the Campbellite family, my friend is badly affected, and thinks every body else also troubled with the same malady.

9th.—Mr. Braden lays great stress on insanity, again and again referring to our poor afflicted sister who was carried out insane the other evening, and that Mr. Wilson pronounced her insane, and three doctors that were dressed introduced to prove the facts of Spiritualism, pronounced her insane; wherefore? because she sees spirits and describes them; hence she is insane. Now ask, are not these Doctors Newcomer and Parker, as well as my friend, Mr. Wilson, insane, when they see spirits?

We answer to this illogical and unfair comparison:

1st.—There is no parallel between the poor woman and Doctors Newcomer and Parker, in the fact that the woman has certain evidences of disease that are unmistakable symptoms of insanity, and Doctors Newcomer and Parker have not.

2d.—She has not, and did not see spirits until her reason had fled, and she had become wild and incoherent.

3d.—She did not see spirits of men and women belonging to our creed and views, but she was afflicted with the phantoms of the church, and saw the spirit of Jesus Christ, saw him in the womb, in the cradle, as a boy, as a man, saw him on the cross, saw him crucified, saw him resurrected, and he had called on her and bade her go to her people, the Scotch, and preach to them the word of God, of his church, and him crucified. And we frankly say that the religion and the teachers of your God, have made this poor sister and woman mad, and when my good friends, Doctors Newcomer and Parker, exhibit aberrations of mind, as this poor woman has done in this hall, we shall at once pronounce them insane. So far as my judgment may be concerned, and what I have said of this poor, afflicted sister and woman, I hold that Mr. Braden has violated every principle of manhood, and sacredness of private conversation, for what I said to him was in confidence and in private. This woman came to me on the afternoon of the evening she became insane, and made the following statement:

"Mr. Wilson, my friends are all the time abusing me and you; they tell me that you are a fool and uneducated, and threaten you and me, and that I shall not go to the discussion any more. Now, Mr. Wilson, I have been Jesus, and he has told me to go to my people, the Scotch, and preach his gospel to them, and that I am to save them from their sins. I saw him in the womb of Mary, the cradle, as a boy, as a man, saw him on the cross, in the tomb, and after the resurrection, and now I must go to my people, the Scotch, as Emma Hardinge has gone to her people, the Englsh. Now Mr. Wilson, you are the man of God that is to send me forth; mean shall I go?"

After a careful examination of her eyes, face, pulse and motions, the sallow, clammy blue of the skin, as well as her incoherent conversation, I asked her if she could believe in me? She replied,

"Yes; implicitly."

"Very well; then you must make me a promise. Will you do it?"

"Yes; I will."

"Well then, you must go home and remain there at home perfectly quiet, keep away from meetings of every kind, do not go to the discussion to night, send for your husband, and tell him just what you have told me. Will you do so?

"Yes; I will—but my friends will not let me be. They keep me all the time abusing you and swearing at you; calling you a fool."

"Very well," we replied, "let them do so. You say to them, please let me be; go to Mr. Wilson, and say to his face what you have to say to him; and, further, you will promise to remain at home thirty days, and go to any meeting during the time, and you will then know what to do. Will you promise me?"

"Yes; I will."

We here say that Mr. Braden has violated a trust spoken in confidence, and had no right to introduce my views given in confidence.

We will say here that this is the first as well as the last conversation we ever had with the woman.

How much time have I now, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman.—Five minutes.

Thank you.

Ladies and gentlemen, for ten nights have we waged a mental war, and I frankly confess that my opponent has left no stone unturned in the domain of Spiritualism. He has brought to bear on us all and every feature that could possibly militate against us, from the beginning in to the hills, and we have dealt blow for blow, thrust for thrust, watching his every word, and in our summing up, night after night, we have quoted his leading thoughts, giving his main points a fair representation.

And now, Mr. Braden, we are about to part. Each of us have our work to do; you in your sphere, I in mine. It is not that we differ in things, but they that sent me—the angel-world, and I shall continue my work so long as I am ordered by the powers that are to continue in the field. I extend you the hand of fellowship. Will you accept it, and shall we part friends in the interest of humanity; you to your work, I to mine; each to heal the wounds he has received?

Amidst great cheering, Mr. Braden sprang forward, grasped our hand, and we who had met and thrust at each other for ten nights, stood before our people as friends, to do, to dare, and fight on the battle of human rights.

After which, Mr. Braden made a few remarks in a happy strain of words—to all the valedictory.

Resolutions of thanks were then passed, thanking Messrs. Duchon and Wheelock for the impartial manner in which they had maintained order during this discussion. And then we remembered Judge Stark of Cleveland, who presided in an able manner over the first discussion. Passed by a unanimous vote.

And so the fight was at an end.

E. V. Wilson's Appointments.

E. V. Wilson will lecture in Janesville, Wisconsin, on Saturday evening, April 22, at 8 o'clock; on Sunday morning, April 23d, at 10:45; Sunday evening, at 7:30.

Will speak in Du Quoin on Saturday evening, April 29th, at 8 o'clock; on Sunday morning, April 30th, at 10:45; Sunday evening, at 7:30.

Will speak on the Sundays in May in Kansas City; two Sundays of June, in Fort Scott, Kansas; first Sunday in July, in Carthage, Mo; second Sunday in July, at Springfield, Mo.; August and September, in Minnesota.

The friends will address us at Kansas City, Mo. during May; at Fort Scott, Kansas, during June, or at Lombard, Da Page Co., Ill.

LET NO ONE SUPPOSE that we esteem it a pleasure to send the paper to any subscriber on credit, after the time has expired for which payment has been made in advance, unless the subscriber deems it a favor to him or her. We are always well-pleased to discontinue the JOURNAL, on receipt of arrearages, when it is no longer wanted. So long as it is paid for, we expect it will be paid for.

speak from the head—the reasoners; and we have those, myself among them, who take the intuitional side of the question. Of course, both have the same liberty in the writing of tracts; but to me the intuitional is the chief good. I would like to promulgate the idea of spirit communion. Probably, many tracts I would like, my friend the Professor would not; and the same with myself as regards his views. I would like to give to the world—that now has no evidence—the incontestible proof we have of a continued and conscious existence after death—an indefeasible immortality that is the birthright of every soul. I do not believe that God wrote the Bible, either himself or through any authorized agents, as has already been affirmed. "The truth before Scripture" is the correct view, to my mind; but I do not desire to send out into the world the idea that there is nothing better than ourselves. I can not define that superior something, because it can not be done; neither do I want any man to do it for me—it is the unknowable.

Chairman.—Of course it is impossible; nobody pretends to understand the Infinite. What is your name?

Wetherbee.—John Wetherbee.

Chairman.—You have been an infidel, and are now a Spiritualist?

Wetherbee.—Yes, sir.

STORY.—I would like to ask the Committee, through their Chairman, whether the incorporation of the Society depends upon their agreement with the sentiments expressed in the published tracts in their possession, or whether they consider them immortal?

SIXTH.—If does not depend upon our agreement with the sentiments expressed. We might for instance, vote for the incorporation of a society publishing tracts in favor of free-trade.

STORY.—The question, then, of the views expressed, would not affect you?

SIXTH.—No, not materially; provided they did not contravene any of the laws of the Commonwealth.

STORY.—My point is simply this: We believe that very many tracts that are published and spread abroad over the country are immoral and libellous; but it is the historical policy of Massachusetts to protect the freedom of religious opinions, and the liberty of private judgment. We desire the same freedom for ourselves, to endeavor to promulgate our views, as others have.

Chairman.—Do I understand you to reflect upon the tracts published by this Society—that is, do you believe some of those published by this Society are libelous?

STORY.—No—not at all. I referred to those of other incorporated societies.

Concluded next week.

SPIRIT MESSAGES

Given During the Years 1860 to 1870, inclusive,—from FRANKLIN, LINCOLN, ADAMS, JACKSON, WEBSTER, PENN, and others to the Author,

THOMAS RICHMOND.

This is one of the most interesting books in the whole catalogue of Spiritualist publications. Its author is well and widely known throughout the Western States, he having been one of the early pioneers and is a man of extraordinary energy and ability, who would make his mark in any country. After an active business life of over sixty years, he now, in his seventy-fifth year, is as strong and hearty, and as capable of doing business as he was fifty years ago. His ability, energy, and acquaintance with many of the leading men of the country, induced him ont to Franklin and other distinguished spirits to the most fitting instrument with which they were to accomplish a mighty undertaking. The manner in which they selected him and how they achieved are herein related by the author in a book of 288 pages.

PRICE: Cloth, $1.50; postage, 16 cents. Enamled paper sides and cloth back, 75 cents; postage, 6 cents.

To those who Love Justice, Admire Goodness, and desire to follow a life well recommended for its rare excellence, this book of moral precepts, for ancient among men, this code of moral precepts is particularly recommended.

PRICE:—35 cents Postage 4 cents.

SPIRIT ARTIST.

MRS. E. A. BLAIR, MEDIUM.

Mrs. Blair, one of the most wonderful Spirit Artists in the world (specimens of whose work can be seen in the Reception-Room of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE), is now ready to furnish beautiful specimens of her work, ranging in price from five to one hundred dollars, to suit the purchaser.

It should be borne in mind that Mrs. Blair executes this work when perfectly blindfolded (and, when convenient, before a public audience), and with a rapidity that astonishes all who witness the operation.

The manner in which these paintings are executed was published in No. 3, Vol. 9, of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

For beauty of style and artistic finish they cannot be surpassed. They are worthy of a prominent place in the drawing-room or the picture-gallery. Considering that these paintings are such positive demonstrations of SPIRIT POWER IN THE FINE ARTS, no SPIRITUALIST should be without one or more of them.

We will receive orders for any priced pictures desired—ranging from five to one hundred dollars. For ten dollars and upward, it will be well for the person wanting to send his or her own autograph, that the Spirit Artist may get an rapport with him or her, the better to enable him to execute a more appropriate piece of work, to order.

In sending orders, address S. S. JONES, 189 South Clark St., Chicago, Ill., inclosing the money by a Post Office Money Order, Bank Check, or Registered Letter.

Mrs. Frances will be furnished at wholesale prices, when ordered, ranging from one dollar upward, and sent by express to any part of the country.

A BOOK FOR WOMEN:

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

A book by a woman, for women, on the diseases of the sex. The LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, speaking of the book says:

"After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had of its class. It is written for women; it is full of wise counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people most need assistance. It is a safe book for young people to read, for any body indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to such subjects. There is not a sentence in it that can be perverted or misunderstood, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country."

Harper's Magazine says:

"We wish the chapter 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

"I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

Godey's Lady's Book says:

"This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class we have yet seen."

Price, $1.50; postage, 16 cents. Address RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 189 S. Clark street, Chicago.

SECOND EDITION.

A WORK OF GREAT RESEARCH.

ONE RELIGION: MANY CREEDS.

BY ROSS WINANS.

"We object to what the Church demands, as unfounded and unjustifiable confidence in the infallibility of the writings of Moses and the prophets, and the Evangelists and the Apostles. We dissent from a sentimental attachment to an impossible compound of God and man. We protest that Christian theology, as we have it, is not taught by God himself, nor by Christ himself, nor is it consistent with established facts, nor is it comprehensible by our reason. We would show you that Christianity, as taught among us, is no better than other systems taught in other than Christian countries, and in some respects not so good."

The historic part of the Bible, in relation to the creation of the world, has its counterpart also in the several systems of theology here mentioned. They all had their origin, more or less, in the same manner, and equally wide of the truth, as that recorded in the Bible. The time and manner of the creation, do man has ever known, or ever will know in this life; nor is such knowledge of importance in preparing us for the life to come."—EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

This book is a large 12 mo. of nearly 400 pages, printed on fine, heavy white paper, and is sold at much less than the actual cost. Price, $1.50; postage, 22 cents.

THE HIEROPHANT,

OR

Gleanings from the Past.

BY G. C. STEWART.

"Being an exposition of Biblical astronomy, and the symbolism and mysteries on which were founded all ancient religious and secret societies, with an explanation of the dark sayings and allegories that abound in the Pagan, Jewish and Christian Bibles, also the real sense of the doctrines and observances of the modern Christian churches."

The above is a good deal to promise the reader that he will find done up in a neat little 16 mo. book of 284 pages, but we assure our readers that they will find all the subjects mentioned treated in a clear, concise, and satisfactory manner.

The book has already passed through several editions, and the demand, of late, has greatly increased.

I AM.

BY MRS. F. O. HYZER.

Alone on the infinite ocean—
Inspired by invisible cause—
Swept on by its tidal emotion—
Held fast by immutable laws—
With nothing behind or above
To limit my life or enshore me
From measureless wisdom and love;

Surrounding, yet never surrounded—
The deathless, the infinite I
Can really never be bounded,
Since all in its being doth lie,
And only to sense being real,
And sense lying ever within
The fullness of Being's ideal
To me seems to end and begin.

But when I won'd scan the beginning
Or ending of strata of laws,
The moment I seem to be winning
An ultimate seed'ng of Cause,
The upheaving tide of the ocean,
Whose wavelets are measureless spheres,
Submerges all sense of proportion,
And boundary all disappears.

This feeling of utter aloneness:—
This sense of the Selfhood divine—
This knowing through infinite oceness
That all of my Father's is mine,
Gilds earth with a glory supernal,
Till what we call "past" and "to be,"
Sink into a present eternal,
And ALL in the infinite ME.

Thus waking another to blessing,
My consciousness newly doth bless:
Another of joy dispenseth member,
Rouses in a pang of distress.
Thus ever my own selfhood seeing,
I merge in the measureless Whole:
Thus lost in the infinite Being,
I find my own infinite Soul.

And thus I'm prepared for each season,
Whatever the same I may find,
Protected and shielded by Reason,
The prince and magician of mind,
Whose magical scepter transforneth
The fiend to an angel of light,
While love every latitude warmeth
To healthful and holy delight.

Upborne by this fathomless ocean—
This slumberless ocean of Cause—
Soul-keyed to its tidal emotion—
Held fast by immutable laws—
With nothing behind or before me—
With nothing below or above,
I've nothing to bound or enshore me
But infinite Wisdom and Love.

PLANCHETTE.

Wonderful Workings.

It is with considerable trepidation that I venture to "say my say" in regard to the manifestations, Spiritualistic, or otherwise, of Planchette. "Who shall decide when doctors disagree?" and after all I have heard and read on the subject, I only propose simply to give you the results of my experience and observation in regard to what Epes Sargent calls "the Despair of Science," without any attempt at what for me is impossible, of elucidating anything in regard to it.

I am quite well aware to what I am exposing myself in confessing to having had any dealings with this mysterious toy, or machine. On the one hand, the Spiritualists will see proof of unseen spiritual agency; and on the other, our Materialistic friends will "pooh-pooh" the whole thing, and declare me to be another victim of delusion. In order to enable me to steer between this Scylla and Charybdis, I here make my bow to the good friends on both sides of the question, and declare that I am not going to be drawn into discussion either way, for I believe nothing either way. But some time, I think, some daring scientific man will arise, who, not being deterred by either the over-credulity on the one side or the over-incredulity on the other, will calmly investigate this mystery, and comparing all the facts given by impartial, witnesses, reach some definite scientific conclusion, and out of this chaos of strange things bring some orderly arrangement which will place all the facts of modern Spiritualism in their rightful order, as the natural sequence of some new unknown law of Nature. As the world so old, and man so wise, that there is never to be anything more discovered, I wonder?—I think not; and so for the benefit of this future man of Science who is thus to make himself famous, I submit the following experience with Planchette:

About a year ago our neighborhood became smitten with the Planchette craze; that is, half a dozen people in the vicinity bought, and experimented with that little heart-shaped toy, and the rest talked about it. Every one that knows anything about Planchette, knows that it is a capricious little creature that will move under certain undefined and indefinite circumstances. The knowledge of this fact led me to infer before I experimented with it, that here was where the deception was,—that only those who chose to move Planchette did move it, and the whole thing was an imposition. Still I was anxious to satisfy myself on this point, and when one evening at a neighbor's house, Planchette was introduced as an amusement, I placed my hand, with others, upon it, in the prescribed way. To my surprise it moved and wrote,—not very sensibly, but perhaps as much so as were the questions addressed to it by half a dozen merry people.

The young lady of the house was said to be the presiding genius of that Planchette; that is, it would only move under her hands, a young lady whose simplest word on any other matters I should have unhesitatingly believed; yet with only my own hand and hers on Planchette, I could not be quite sure that she did not by some dexterous movement of her hand make Planchette write the replies to questions. So I begged permission that I might try alone. Not a move of perverse Planchette! My own young, sister being present, in whose good faith I had perfect confidence, I asked her to place her hands on the tiny platform with mine. To our mutual surprise it began immediately to move; at first in a series of ever widening circles, then to make "pot-hooks and trammels"; finally, to write. Questions were then asked by the others present and some of the answers were correct, the most of them vague and unsatisfactory, intermingled with a few downright lies. But I did not feel satisfied with this or other like experiments, so when one day a friend said to me, "I received lately a present of a Planchette, but none of us can do anything with it. If you like you can take it home and experiment with it,"

Now "at home" there was a strong prejudice against Planchette, but I thought I might venture to accept the loan of one for a few days at least, and so satisfy my unabated curiosity in regard to its workings. I tell this that it may be understood that there was no trickery about it, and no connivance at my so-called spiritual juggling. I did take Planchette home, and in spite of prejudiced frowns and shrugs at the sight of the harmless little platform, experimented with it to my heart's content.

Then first was I really surprised, for I did not very well know how to scale the evidence of my own senses. I was not in the least predisposed to believe in Planchette's mysterious powers yet how was I to account for the fact that without any volition of my own, and with only my hand near it, it wrote replies to my mental, but audible questions from myself or others in the room with me? Answered them, not always sensibly, not often satisfactorily, but frequently and most usually in point-blank contradiction of my inmost conviction. Now I certainly would not wish to contradict and insult myself, yet with only Planchette and I to blame that is what the words written often amounted to. I give one or two instances of the general style of Planchette's "communications." When asked one evening what Planchette had to say to a certain person present, my hand alone being on it, it wrote:—

"Tell her that Christ died for all." "Who do you mean by 'all'?" I asked. "You," was the rather irrelevant reply.

"I doubt it very much," I said. "You have no reason to doubt," it went on.

"Planchette, your dictum don't amount to any more than that of anybody else, unsupported by evidence. I tell you I have good reason to doubt your statement."

"Peter had no reason to doubt either."

"You're getting mixed up, my friend. It was Thomas who doubted, not Peter, if I recollect aright."

"You have not read your Bible then right," insisted Planchette.

"Peter did doubt," some one present here remarked; "don't you remember the incident of his walking on the water, and what Christ said to him?"

So Planchette was right that time.

"Tell me," I continued, "since you know so much, by what means you manage to write by Planchette?"

"You have no right to ask," wrote the Mystery, falling back on its dignity.

"Oh I come, now—that won't do to bluff me off in that style. If I wish to know, I have a decided right to ask."

"Believe, and thou shalt be saved."

"Too indefinite. Who shall I believe,—the Hindoo, Mohammedan, Jewish, or Christian belief?"

"We have no right to cleave to old traditions."

"Spoken like the oracle you are; but where shall we get new ones?"

"That we have here to-night. You have no right to doubt." Going back to the original subject.

"Beg your pardon, but I think I have"

"Addle-head!" Written quickly, and with a savage jerk of Planchette.

The other members of our family getting a little interested, tried with various success to make Planchette write under their hands; but, strange to say, it would only write connectedly for me. Now if any one else made this statement, not knowing them, I should be apt to think that such a person was trying to impose upon my credulity. It is not a pleasant thing to have one's word doubted, but I have determined to state things just as they were, whatever be imagined of me. I asked once the reason of Planchette's failure to write for them as for me, as I was very anxious that it should, in order to satisfy them that the writing was done independent of me. The answer was—

"Because they have not electricity enough about them."

"Then electricity is necessary to Planchette's developments?"

"Yes."

At another time I asked "what were the conditions necessary in a so-called 'medium?'"

"True healthy conditions," it wrote.

There was only another lady and myself present, and like myself, a stranger until now to anything of this kind. We looked at each other, as it wrote this, with a triumphant smile of contradiction. We had got it into our heads somehow, that mediums were generally rather sickly people, and we spoke our thoughts aloud. Instantly Planchette turned the tables upon us by writing—

"By true healthy conditions we mean half matter and half spirit."

The limits of this article forbid any attempt to write down anything but these disconnected samples of the strange conversations thus carried on. Always Planchette insisted upon the fact that "spirits" governed its movements.—Once I pushed it from me, saying, as I did so:

"Oh! Planchette, you puzzle me. I can't understand you at all."

The moment that my hand again touched it, it scribbled off this sentence:—

"In the hour of death you will know."

"But I may have to wait a long time for that," I said, willing to test its prophetic power.

"You will not!" Written promptly.

"How long shall I need to wait?" Thus again, as a bait.

"Till God's time." As misty, vague, and non-committal as ever, you perceive.

Now for the results of my observations in regard to Planchette. In the first place, I was careful to guard myself from giving bias to the movements of Planchette by any volition of my own. Afterwards, making sure as possible that I kept my hand from guiding the platform, I tried the effect of willing it to write something different from what it should do in order to make sense or nonsence. For instance, when it commenced making a letter or beginning a word, I would think hard of some other letter, which would make nonsense of the sentence. My experiments, at first, in this direction, were fruitless; on the contrary, it often startled me by the odd and unexpected way it would give to some sentence who[illegible] meaning I had anticipated in my own mind. But at last, under different circumstances, and with other Planchettes, I did manage occasionally effect this.

I remarked, too, the invariably [illegible] unvarnishable character of the sentences written, as Planchette averred, under "spirit" control. It was in vain to question, hoping for a straightforward, definite answer. Any other answer you might hope for save that,—saucy, polite, impertinent, friendly, sarcastic, or sentimental, but never definite. In writing long messages purporting to come from deceased friends, (and sometimes in short ones,) there was often a seeming failure of the supply of strength necessary to complete the sentence. After a few moments rest, however, it would suddenly start as if imbued with new vigor, but rarely in this case ever attempting to finish the incomplete sentence, seeming, even when urged to do so, to have forgotten the train of ideas which suggested it.

The handwriting often varied, and queer freaks in the way of fantastic pictures and prodles were indulged in, often when Planchette was under the hands of those who had no taste nor talent in that direction. Often, too, it shocked those to whose natures such things were thoroughly repugnant, by apparently malicious and downright falsehood, or by startlingly profane language—afterward apologizing, and explaining why it did so.

The first sensation I experienced in holding the hand for a while lightly over the board, was akin to that felt in taking hold of a galvanic battery, but in a lighter degree. If held there long, the hand first grew hot, then deathly cold, the palm damp with a perspiration; afterward the whole body seemed surcharged with electricity, shooting pains were felt in various parts of the body, and the arm most used ached with a numb, steady pain, especially at the shoulder. The nervous system seemed very much disturbed, but the general effect on the health was bad. Creakings, snappings and tappings, which might be real and might be imaginary, were heard during the still hours of the night.

Having investigated so far as to find that without science to aid me nothing more was to be found out in regard to Planchette; and furthermore, that the continuance of such unsatisfactory investigations was prejudical to both health and comfort, I gave it up.

Desirous of thinking more highly of my departed friends, and not caring to renew my acquaintance with them, at least until I myself shall be reduced to their apparently diluted condition of mind and body, I have not the slightest faith in the spiritual origin of the things described by Spiritualists, and seen by the rest of us; yet I must give my impartial evidence that such things are, from whatever source they emanate, hoping earnestly for the day when these things shall all be explained scientifically and reasonably.

Respectfully, SARA A. UNDERHOOD.

THE CLINKING TROWEL.

The Sounds Heard by Hundreds of People —Gathering of the Spiritualists—Is it Something Unaccountable?

Not long since the writer of this article attended a spiritual circle held at the house of Mrs. Laing, corner of Eighth avenue and Twenty-eighth street, and during the evening he listened to the recital of a story quite as strange as any that has ever bothered the brain of philosophers.

This story, as told by a person of apparent good common sense, and one not easily deceived, was in reference to some spiritual manifestations connected with a certain school-house on East Thirty-ninth street.

The substance of this strange story was to this effect: About five years ago, during the erection of this school-house, a mason, familiarly known as "Jack Shephard," greatly addicted to liquor, fell from the scaffold while intoxicated, and was instantly killed.

Nothing more was thought of it at the time than would have been over any other similar tragic event. His fellow-craftsmen attended his funeral, after which they went on with the work until the walls of the building were completed and handed over to the carpenters.

After the building was enclosed, a watchman was employed to take charge of the premises. One night, about twelve o'clock, this watchman was startled in his lonely meditations by hearing the sound of a trowel, as though a mason was engaged in laying brick.

The watchman was almost petrified, and for some moments he could not move hand or foot. He had only a short time before been over the entire building, and he felt certain that no person was on the premises except himself. The night was oppressively calm and still, but every now and then the ringing click of a mason's trowel would break the stillness of the hour with unmistakable distinctness.

It was nearly an hour before the watchman could collect sufficient courage to make an investigation. At length, with cautious steps, he moved tremblingly in the direction from whence the sounds proceeded; but after making a thorough examination, and seeing nobody, he began to grow bold in the belief that he had been imposed upon by his own imagination, or had mistaken some other sound coming from some other locality for that of a mason's trowel.

But while he was felicitating himself thus, that same unmistakable sound again startled him, seeming to proceed from a spot only a few feet from where he stood. As soon as he could recover himself sufficiently, he hurried down to the front entrance of the building, and there there remained until a policeman came along. To him he related his strange experience, and invited the incredulous officer to listen and account for it, if he could.

The two men ascended to the upper stories of the building, and had listened only a minute when they both heard it repeated so clearly that the policeman said at once that some person was on the premises making a noise for the purpose of frightening him, perhaps to scare him away entirely, the better to accomplish a robbery. With this view they both made a thorough examination of the premises, during which the sounds of the trowel were heard with great distinctness, sometimes in one locality and then again in other.

At length the policeman became as much puzzled as the watchman, and after a while continued his beat, and left the frightened man to continue his watch.

The next night several others to whom the story had been told watched with him, and they all heard the sound of the clicking trowel, and did all in their power to solve the mystery attending it; but all to no purpose, however.

The watchman did not lack for company after that, for the story of poor Jack Shephard's ghost haunting the scene of his earthly labor soon became noised abroad, although the majority of people believed that some wag was playing a trick on those who were fools enough to listen.

Several Spiritualists, among whom was the narrator and three others then present, visited the spot while the building was in process of completion, and Mrs. Laing, an excellent medium, there obtained a communication from the spirit of Jack Shephard, in which he convinced her and those in company with her that it was his spirit that was creating the excitement; that he could not forsake the scene of his last labors, and where his own foolishness had cost him his life.

This, however much it might have convinced Spiritualists, failed to make others believe that there was not imposition somewhere; and although the strange sounds of that unseen trowel continued to be heard by many, there were but a few who endorsed the theory that it was caused by spiritual agency.

So the excitement gradually died away, and as the building approached completion the sounds became less frequent. Still, however, the Spiritualists never paid a visit to the locality without hearing them, and becoming more and more firmly convinced that they were right, and that it was nothing more nor less than the disembodied spirit of drunken Jack Sheppard.

After the building was completed and occupied, the sounds almost entirely ceased. It was only when a band of Spiritualists visited the locality that any of the former sounds could be heard; but, said the narrator, they are still to be heard under such circumstances.

The writer was not slow in mentioning his entire disbelief in the truth of so much of the story as related to the present manifestations of this phenomenon, but at the same time indicated his entire willingness to be convinced that such was the case.

After some conversation about the affair, it was agreed by all parties present that we should pay a visit to the school-house in question, and see if the ghostly trowel could again be heard.

Accordingly, about a dozen ladies and gentlemen repaired to the locality. We stood for some moments watching the building from the opposite side of the street, when all of a sudden the clear, ringing sounds of a mason's trowel was heard upon the silent midnight air.

It was not heard only once, but many times and quite as distinctly as though the sound had been produced by a material trowel smartly struck upon a real brick, both in the apparent act of breaking it to some certain length, and also in bedding it down into the mortar.

The writer heard it, and was not mistaken in the sound, although he may have been regarding the source from whence it proceeded. Be that as it may, there is certainly room for close investigation and subject for much speculation regarding this strange acoustic manifestation.

LITERARY.

The Lover's Library—J. S. Redfield, 140 Fulton St., New York. Western News Co., Chicago. Price, 50 cents. The publisher says:

"The present is the initial number of a series of volumes, which it is proposed to publish under the general title of 'The Lover's Library.' The stories will be selected with the utmost care, and the aim will be to present the very best love-stories which have ever been written, either in our own or in any other language.

The purpose, in publishing this series of books, is to bring together, in a convenient, easily-access ble and inexpensive form—for the benefit, especially, of the younger generation—these stories which most adults have read, or ought to have read, and may like to read again."

Harper's Magazine, for May, contains its usual variety of entertaining and instructive reading, illustrated by fifty-nine fine wood-cuts.

This number concludes the Forty-second volume. The Publishers have fulfilled the promise made by them at the commencement of this Volume:—that it should surpass its predecessors.

Death and the After Life, by A. J. Davis; Wm. White & Co., Boston, Publishers. Messrs. Wm. White & Co., Boston, Publishers. Messrs. Wm. White & Co., have been obliged to issue another edition of this delightful book, in order to supply the constantly increasing demand. This the third edition is got up in the usual neat and workmanlike manner, that characterizes all books issued by this enterprising firm.

Home and Health, for April, by W. R. De Puy & Bro., Publishers, New York—comes to us late. The Publishers give as the reason that they were obliged to change the name from Health and Home—the title of the first number to Home and Health, to avoid confusion in the mails with Hearth and Home. Our readers will please note the change. This new candidate for public favor is deserving of patronage. There are single articles in this number worth a year's subscription to every reader.

American Journal of Microscopy. Chicago; G. Mead & Co.

The object of this magazine is to spread a knowledge of the microscope, and is of interest to all classes. It is edited by E. M. Hale, M. D., a gentlemen who stands high in his profession, and who has given close study to microscopy.

Illustrated History of the Siege of Paris. The numbers published during the siege are printed on extra paper, forming a series of about twenty-six issues, corresponding to six months, —from the 15th of September, 1870, to March 15th, 1871. Terms of subscription: one year, $12; six months, $6; single copy, 25 cents. The Illustration may be obtained from any newsdealer throughout the United States, American News Company, New York, General Agents.

The Railroad Gazette, A. N. Kellogg, 110 and 112 Madison street, Chicago, Publisher. This is the very best railroad paper in the country, and is full of interest for all who have to do with railroads,—and who does not? The number for April 15th is of especial interest, as it contains a splendid full-page likeness of Capt. John B. Turner, with the best biographical sketch of this great railroad man that has yet appeared.

Clerical Shortcomings.

Rev. McWilliams, an M. E. preacher, while holding a protracted meeting at Rensselaer, Ind., was arrested for horse stealing and polygamy,—"having three wives living, and was about to be married to the fourth, a young lady of the first respectability, living in the above named place." But for the arrest for horse-stealing, he would have accomplished his fiendish design.

Another at Wheamack, Ind., an M. E. preacher, was tried and sentenced two years in the penitentiary, for attempting to rape one of his charge. It is this class of men that cry out against honest Spiritualists, vilifying and slandering their superiors.

—The Louisville Commercial says: "A novel church action was taken Sunday last in the Second Presbyterian Church, in reading resolutions expelling Mr. E. R. Sporrier, one of the prominent adherents to the spiritualistic philosophy in this city. Dr. Stuart Robinson read the resolutions which embraced the cause of the action, and expressed the hope that the heretic would return to the true faith, when he would be again joyfully received into the bosom of the church. This is the first instance, we believe, where an adherent to the new doctrine has been formally expelled, or suspended from an orthodox church in this city."

—J. L. Potter, an excellent trance speaker, held a discussion with a Mr. Pike, one of the Noise School of Christians, commencing April 11th.

—C. C. Colby writes from Carthage Mo.: "We have been enjoying ourselves very much during the past week, under the inspirational teachings of our highly gifted sister, C. Fannie Allyn. She is drawing crowded houses, and being well paid. The only trouble is to find halls sufficiently large to accommodate those who are anxious to hear her."

—A Harrisburgh, (Pa.) paper states: "We understand that several members of the Evangelical Church on North street, have withdrawn from that congregation, to avoid having their names stricken from the rolls, on account of their identification with the spirit rapping movement in our city."

QUESTIONS ANSWERED.

Letter from Wm. B. Fahnestock.

Bro. Jones.—I have just returned from a two weeks' visit to Marietta, York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia, where I met many friends—some of whom were anxious that I should account for the phenomena or appearances which they thought were opposed to my views.

At their request, and with your permission, I will answer them through the Religio-Philosophical Journal, as well as some questions put to me in one of your last issues.

The fact, that spirits can not control any part of the body that is not in a passive state of somnambulism, proves that the condition of the part when in that state differs materially from the normal condition, and no doubt will account for, or explain, why one hand placed upon a mediascope or a planchette, may act differently or the reverse of another; and as the aura of each person is peculiar, different results may be looked for, independent of any magnetic influence.

If "animal magnetism" had an existence, and produced a result at all, it should be the same in all cases, and necessarily would be devoid of intelligence.

But, aside from all this, the question is—if you fill a "negative person" with magnetism, were that possible, would he not become positive, and if positive, would he not then, according to the magnetic theory, be subject to control, etc?

The assumption is absurd—and if a person can throw himself into the somnambulic condition by an act of his own will, what use is there for the interference of a so-called operator?

I have "charity" enough to let every one enjoy his own opinion, even if they believe white to be black; but if their belief is likely to do harm to any one, it would be anything but "charity," if I did not endeavor to demonstrate the truth, or that the one was not the other.

It has also been said that when I teach a person how to enter the somnambulic condition, that my magnetism goes to the subject independent of my consciousness, etc. I would ask those who hold this opinion, how they account for the fact, that many of those who read the instructions given in my book, are enabled to throw themselves into the somnambulic condition?

Is it magnetism, when I never saw or handled the books that contain my instructions, or saw or knew the persons who entered the condition by reading the same?

They might as well say, that learning to read, write, draw, paint, or that the study of any art, trade or profession from books, was the result of magnetism.

A celebrated medium also asked me why it was, that when in the presence of a certain gentleman, although disinclined to converse with him at all, she would, before she was aware of it, enter into the most sprightly and entertaining conversation, even for hours.

The lady being exceedingly susceptible or mediumistic, I accounted for it, by stating that it certainly was caused by the influence of some spirit that always accompanied him.

But as the lady did not believe in spirits, although she had just seen above my head the name of Emma, and a bouquet of small flowers, that the spirit always presents to me for recognition, she denied their existence, and ascribed all the phenomena exhibited by mediums to a great sea of thought, "beyond the river;" and that when they (mediums) were in condition, they received all impressions, visions, arts and prophecies, etc., from that great source.

If this were so, how do such persons account for the "tiny rap," the moving of tables untouched by mortal hands, the playing upon musical instruments, the writing upon slates held under and close to the leaf of the table, the dancing of a heavy piano with four men upon it, and a thousand other feats that require power as well as intellect?

This lady has been entranced frequently, and spirits have spoken Spanish, French, Italian and other languages through her, of which, she has no knowledge whatever. She has seen and described spirits correctly to my certain knowledge, and yet she ascribed all this to a sea of thought, which, if true, would destroy individuality as well as responsibility.

Let those who hold this theory account for the "tiny rap" upon the principles of that doctrine, and I will subscribe to their views, if they do so satisfactorily.

TO WM. B. FAHNESTOCK.

Letter from Dr. W. Fernone.

W. B. Fahnestock, M. D.—Dear Sir:—I have perused from time to time the various articles from your pen, with considerable interest. Have also read the articles from your critics,—all of which, as they appeared in the Religio-Philosophical Journal.

Having been requested to respond to one of the main points in your various essays, I will do so, as briefly as possible.

If I understand you aright, you affirm there is no such agent as "Animal Magnetism," and the wonderful cures performed by or through myself and others, are induced or brought about by the patient or subject passing into somnambulic conditions, solely by the passive exercise of the mind. I have been treating disease for the past ten years successfully in all parts of the Northwest and South; have had a large experience; have been a close observer of all the phenomena arising from the effects of my treatment upon the different temperaments, and your conclusions so perfectly contradict all the facts as I have discovered them, that I refrain from keeping silent. Medical men, many of them, take the same position as yourself, terming it mesmerism, and hold that the relief is only temporary, which I am satisfied is quite true,—whereas, if the subject is treated with magnetism properly, by manipulation and the vital forces thoroughly aroused, and repeated, if necessary, until all disease is removed, there will be no danger of relapse. I can refer you to plenty of cases of the worst character, cured years ago, and still remain well; but to the point more directly. I place my hand upon ice or in cold water, and apply the cold hand upon a person outside the clothing, and he feels at once a strong heat evolving from my hand. Persons holding their hand two feet or more above my head, feel a strong current passing from my head to their hand; others feel a force passing from me to them by coming in my presence. I have stood ten feet from five persons, and in a few moments the whole five were en rapport with the strong magnetic currents emanating from me, which I can at times pass in a clear normal condition. If I manipulate a person, sick or well, these magnetic currents pass over and vibrate every nerve in their system. All of these things occur with subjects who are not somnambulic, biologic or mesmeric. Your position, I believe is, that all sick people can cure themselves, or when the cure is effected by magnetic physicians, it is effected by inducing somnambulism. This, I deny, and what is more, can attest it by demonstration. Take a case of amaurosis—paralysis of the optic nerve,—and you will fail in ever; y case manipulate the base of the brain and temporal region with a magnetic hand, and the chances are that you restore the sight. I have been successful in many cases. If your position be true, and had it been known years ago, myself and others might have been saved great labor, and the over one hundred thousand patients that have been treated by me could have cured themselves had they known how(*). I refer you to my book, "Theory and Success," a copy of which I sent you, to the care of Dr. A. W. Whipple's daughter, eight years old, having a stiff ankle from birth, (page 23). In a few minutes she was perfectly relieved. Would the somnambulic condition have any effect on that ankle? If so, how? Case of Mrs. Boughman (page 37) Stiff ankle for seventeen years—not the least motion. Perfectly relieved. Or, pages 40 and 67, is the still more wonderful case of a case of confirmed insanity, of a young lady in Georgia. Page 52; a girl twelve years old, from birth never used one of her arms, or even to hold it in its natural position, relieved in a few treatments. Such cases can be multiplied when your system would prove abortive, and can only be reached by such treatment as I have alluded to.

In the treatment of disease, I always feel an out going of this magnetism, and some patients absorb it like a sponge, and I feel the difference in my condition.

In all cases of suffering, no matter how acute, immediate relief follows. How can a patient become passive, when acute pain seizes them, so that fear for life absorbs all thoughts? Under these and like experiences, how can I give up my facts to your theory? Is it not patent to every operator, that when he attempts to induce mesmeric, biologic or somnambulic conditions, that animal magnetism is the agent operating in each case, and are not magnetism and electricity the life principles of all things, whether animal, vegetable or mineral. Take away these agents, and you no longer have vital force.

In the treatment of disease by magnetism, success depends largely upon the intelligence with which it is applied, and the reason why so many fail, can be referred to a small brain and a limited amount of proper knowledge, and this practice has brought into disrepute by many of the latter class, who are found in all the cities and towns of our country. One that can relieve the headache thinks he can cure all the diseases of suffering humanity.

In your article on Prayer and Worship, Feb. 18, h, you say "Magnetism is a quality outside of a magnet." I am so full of "animal magnetism," that I am not only a magnet but a human battery. Is not your theory about the same, announced by Mesmer, and pursued by others many years ago, though which some cures were made, but finally abandoned for want of permanency.

Practice is better than theory. Always for light and truth.

SPIRITUALISM.

By Benjamin F. Todd.

NUMBER THREE.

Like some river, ceaseless in its flow, became supplied by never-failing springs in the mountains, so Spiritualism, flowing, ever flowing, rolls down in all its majesty and pride from the ever-green mountains of life.

As the pillar of cloud by day, and the pillar of fire by night guided the Israelites in their protracted journey across the desert sands to the land of promise, so Spiritualism, at the present day, is the pillar of cloud and of fire, to guide the toil and grief worn travelers across the weary waste of physical life, until their tired hands shall cease laborious striving, and their weary forms shall find rest on the flower crowned banks of that river which lies between us and the fadeless land of Forever.

There is no towering height of honorable fame, or of virtue holy, or wise renown, where man's loftiest ambition might ever dare to stray, that Spiritualism would not lead the van, and safely guide his tottering footsteps over the giddy heights. There are no facts or problems of life, either physical, or immortal, that are too deep for its research. It walks with stately step the halls where the occult sciences sit enthroned behind their misty veil, and even, as in days of old, the Dagon of the Philistines fell prostrate before the ark of the Lord, so they, in the presence of Spiritualism, sweep aside their veils, and bowing in humble submission before her, yield their secrets in obedience to her commands. And at the same time, her radiance lights up the dim old corridors, in whose shadows they have hitherto unsuccessfully eluded the grasp of mankind.

The beauty and uses of Spiritualism are seen in the solidity of its basis, in the rapidity of its growth, and in the harmonious development of its gigantic proportions. And whither shall we turn for an illustration which shall portray in any just measure its magnificence and grandeur? Shall we go to the catacombs and pyramids of Egypt? Those mighty structures have so long stood in the stream of time that its dashing waves have well nigh obliterated their hieroglyphical history, and around their base the shifting sands have gathered, until no track or trace is left to tell when and by whom they were reared. There ghostly sphinxes marshal their serried ranks, and tread their noiseless rounds about those sepulchral homes, where sleep only the dead past. But it is not so with Spiritualism. There is no date in the matter about it. It is heaven born and angel crowned. Every nerve, yea, every fibre of its being, is inspired and quickened by the energizing influences of the spirit-world. Thrilling like a current of immortality upon, and throbbing through every avenue of its being. And when, in the future, the work of destruction already commenced on the Egyptian pyramids shall have been completed by the slow, wasting law of change, Spiritualism shall still live, crowned with perennial youth.

If we go to King Solomon's temple for an adequate illustration, our efforts are alike abortive. For, with all its gorgeousness and regal splendor, which led the Queen of Sheba to exclaim that the half had not been told her, yet it pales into incomparable insignificance when contrasted with the spiritual temple that is being reared to day. If the above comparison we do not feel that we rob King Solomon of the glory of his designs, or Grand Master Hiram of his architectural skill and reputation. Their reputation as lasting as time, will live while history perpetuates the names of the great and good. There was a largeness in the conception of the plans, and a completeness in the execution of the designs, that reflected upon them high honor. The cedars were all prepared in the forests of Lebanon, the stones were all hewn in the quarries where they were raised, and so completely was every separate part adapted to the grand whole that when the last stone was put in place, no superstructure was to be reared, no sound of hammer or any other tool of iron rang sonorously along its mighty corridors.

But in the building of the spiritual temple, a greater than Grand Master Hiram is the designer. He is none other than the Almighty Architect of the universe. The whole human family is the material, this world the quarry, and every living soul that has lived, or is still in the unembodied state, but the time is not far distant when they shall be started from their fossilized beds, and be shaped for the position they are destined to occupy in the lofty superstructure.

Some of us are passing through the fitting process even now, being hewed and squared by the surrounding circumstances of life; for they are the means that execute the grand architect's designs. None need attempt to escape the hewing and hammering, for not a living stone goes into that temple that has not had the square of the Master upon it.

We remarked at the commencement of this third portion of our essay on this subject, that the beauty and uses of Spiritualism were seen, first, in the solidity of its basis. And what are the basic principles of our glorious faith, which is challenging the attention of almost the entire world at the present day? We answer, first, negatively, it does not rest upon the intangible foundation of utter nothingness, as do the wild chimeras born of religiously insane thoughts. Nor is it founded upon the mythologies of the dim and shadowy past. It seeks not to perpetuate itself by the sanctity of time-honored institutions. Nor does it rest on, and find its greatest security in the ignorance of the masses, nor seek to rear itself upon the passions and fears of mankind. It teaches no total depravity, or necessity of vicarious atonement. It has no devil to fear, no hell to shun, no angry tyrant of a God to propitiate, and no sins to be forgiven. Its basic principles are inherent in humanity, and are developed in obedience to the demands and needs of human growth.

Resting upon these for its basis, Spiritualism becomes invulnerable to its foes.

Its phenomenal facts and philosophy challenge the attention of the scientific world. It courts investigation at every step of its progressive growth. So strongly and firmly does it rest upon its scientific and philosophical basis, that it has no fear of being overthrown. As well might you attempt to sap the earth in her diurnal revolutions, or remove the starry canopy that overarches this globe of ours to bow at your feet, as to try to stop, or even retard for a moment the onward march of Spiritualism.

Popular theology has brought her slander shotted guns to bear upon it again and again, but all in vain. The serried ranks of sectarianism have charged upon it again and again, but still stands a glorious monument of the invulnerability of eternal truth.

The basis of Spiritualism not only possesses solidity, but has great breadth.

It has no sect to build up, and no creeds to circumscribe it. It has no dogmas to propagate; no church institution to maintain. But it has a platform free to all, and extends to every one the largest liberty, in thought, sentiment and action, that they are capable of appreciating. At the same time, fearing no opposing power, springing from what source it may, Spiritualism looks down from its lofty position with pity upon the religious sects that are groping their way in moral and spiritual blindness, seeking vainly to become religious on the animal plane of development.

EXPERIENCES OF A LECTURER.

Letter from Julia A. Starky.

Dear Journal: Still book me Xenia, Ohio, —not the place where my spirit can grow or expand, for theological bigotry still permeates every avenue, to a superlative degree,—but a place of rest with my dear ones, after long days of work through the country and adjacent towns. These are gala days of life, spent with earnest truth-seekers.

It appears to be impossible to arouse the dormant minds in this place, and I feel (perhaps not Christ-like), to leave them ere long in their own darkness, and "shake the dust off my feet, as a testimony against them."

Since I last wrote, many have received the light, and are now rejoicing in our beautiful Harmonial Philosophy.

I have given many lectures, in several churches, on Temperance and Woman, as well as our [illegible], and unexpectedly was invited to [illegible] it on a Sabbath morning in an M. E. [illegible] preacher, an old veteran in the [illegible] be convinced of spirit return, [illegible] months was a visitor at our [illegible]re dropping in when no one was [illegible]ect him to the church. He introduced the audience as a Christian woman with the same gifts that Jesus promised to believers, and that I would address them from the Scriptures.

I called upon the dear invisibles who have been my aid and support for many years, and I felt strong. I said, upon rising, that their preacher was not responsible for aught that would be presented to them. Before I got through, many remarked, "She must be a Spiritualist;"—but the whole discourse received their hearty approval. I have spoken several times in the same church, and not only converted the preacher, but many of his people.

Another preacher, over a large society, not a hundred miles from here, comes very often, to talk on this grand subject of Spiritualism. He says he shall never stop till he knows it all. I find he has fine mediumistic powers, for when with us he sees the dear ones and can talk with them.

I have lately received invitations from three sectarian societies to join them, and one minister promised to license me as a preacher, independent of my views, thinking it would be saving me from ruin, or that I might be useful to them.

I have been to Waynesville and sprinkled crumbs by the wayside, giving strength and health, physically and spiritually; dedicated a room in the home of Bro. Peacock, for a circle and lecture-room. There are no developed mediums there, but many deep thinkers,—none more earnest than Bro. Brown and wife, and Brother and Sister Peacock. God and the angels bless them for their kindness to the weary traveler.

Have just returned from a professional tour in Clinton and Miami Counties, giving two lectures and some six seances in Wilmington. I stopped at the welcome home of Dr. Finant, who is fine magnetic healer, but will never be appreciated for his noble works in that place. His dear wife has fine clairvoyant powers, but they need better soil to develop in.

From there we journeyed into the country to the home of Bro. Hawes,—a new believer, but a true man. Although a class leader in the M. E. Church, he invited the people in to see and hear a clairvoyant Spiritualist, and by seven o'clock his house was crowded. They knew nothing of his new views, and many never heard of Spiritualism. It well repaid us for all the contumely we have had to bear in Xenia for the last three years, to see the intense interest manifested by every one present. A lecture was given showing the beauties of our philosophy, and then about twenty tests, with many names given, closing up by describing characters. A resolution was adopted, that I should come amongst them every four weeks and work for their soul's as well as bodies. One old man rejoiced in spirit indeed, saying: "Oh, that is just what I've been looking for! I had come to the conclusion that this was all of life—nothing beyond; but, thank God! they all live, and I shall live also. They will make me a better man, for I know they are with me, and instead of praying to an unknown God, I will ask my dear ones to strengthen and assist me, and keep me from falling into temptation."

One thing I had quite forgotten, but must not omit. Although we have but few believers here,—honest ones, at least,—still there are many others that come to receive our magnetic treatment, as well as my dear companion's medical (homeopathic) aid, to have their conditions diagnosed, and to receive other benefits from my clairvoyance. This aroused the ire of a certain elder that presides over an M. E. Church, and he gave notice to his people that he should preach against one of the most terrible delusions of the age. What few Spiritualists we have here, turned out en masse for the occasion. I was well known to him, and he had himself consulted me about his health, and when he rose from his knees, after coming into the church, he espied the very one he was going to fire bombshells at; perhaps he wasn't a little nonplussed! He took up his notes that had been in process of accumulation for months, dropped them and his eyes, and was sore afflicted indeed. The opening prayer was the most vindictive and angry production that I ever heard; and he began his discourse, and finished it in the same style. He was generous enough to say that he believed I was spirits, but they were all of the devil,—and went on to prove it by authors that were opposed to our philosophy.

The eyes of many were upon me, for I had been the means of bringing health and comfort to nearly half of his members, and many had become very mediumistic and sought me for advice and counsel. I knew I had as many friends there as himself, so I graciously allowed him to proceed.

He boldly asserted that no one could prove Spiritualism by the Bible. I knew he would not meet me in discussion, although he had allowed me his church to lecture in (as Woman), before he knew that I was a Spiritualist. So a friend that was passing through town sent him an invitation, proposing to prove Spiritualism in all its phases by the Bible, but he refused all controversy on the subject. He said it was too bad that this direful delusion should be brought from the East and get into his church, absorbing the minds and the money of his people, all of which meant me, as I am the only medium in the place. If they would "come to him, he would tell their fortunes for nothing,—read the Bible, and what is not there you have no right to fathom."

But enough of that. When will humanity throw off the dark mantle of sectarianism and bigotry? Not until Spiritualists will have independence enough to come out openly and fight together under the standard of truth and right.

Fraternally yours,

Julia A. Starky.

Testimonial of Dr. Slade's Mediumship.

Being in New York City not long since, I called upon Dr. Slade, the celebrated test medium, 207 West 32nd street.

I said to the doctor, I had called to see if there was anything for me. It was about 9 o'clock, P. M., consequently the room (a parlor) was light as noonday. We sat down to a common black walnut table, with two projecting leaves, like the old style kitchen tables. The doctor and myself were the only persons in the room at the time. The doctor sat clear of the table, so I could distinctly see his entire person.

We laid our hands on the table, when I very soon heard raps. The table rocked, and crowded up close to me. The doctor then took a common school slate, and placed on it a small piece of slate pencil, about the size and shape of a kernel of wheat. He then placed the slate under the leaf of the table, he holding one corner, and I the other, firmly up against the leaf.

I will digress here, and say that I had a father, J. A. Armstrong, and a brother, Samuel L. Armstrong, who departed this life some eighteen or twenty years since. Also two little daughters, aged respectively eight and ten years, who died a few years since, named Ella and Lillie.

Under these circumstances, I very soon heard the writing commence, and then three little raps signifying that they were through. We removed the slate, and found written upon it in a very plain legible hand:

"I am glad to meet you." Signed, S. Armstrong.

I said, "please give your full name, if you have not."

The next time I found written:

"I have been trying to come for a long time." Signed, Samuel L. A.

I then said, "have you any message to your family?"

The doctor then placed the slate on my head, holding it off at arms' length, keeping one hand upon the table, and holding the slate with his thumb and finger. He could not possibly see the top of the slate as we sat.

Under these circumstances I heard the writing as before, and found written

"Tell my friends I can come, and am happy." Signed, S. L. A.

I then said, "please give way, and let some other friend come."

We put the slate under the leaf again, and found written on it again, in the same hand:

"J. Armstrong."

I said, "please give your full name." I then found written:

"My son, it is your father. J. A. Armstrong."

I said to the doctor I was satisfied, and would withdraw from the table. He said they wished to write once more. The next time I got:

"Good bye, God bless you, my son." Signed, J. A. A.

Two days after, I called on the doctor again, and found circumstances and everything about the room and table the same as before.

We placed the slate under the leaf of the table again, and found written upon it, but in a different hand, looked like that of a lady, but very legible:

"Dear father, we all come to see you." Signed, E. and L. A.

The next time I held the slate without the doctor touching it, and found written:

"Oh, dear father, how you bless us by coming to let us talk to you." Signed, E. and L. A.

Which would certainly mean Ella and Lillie Armstrong.

The doctor then inquired if they would raise the table and play on the accordeon. We found written:

"We will if we can."

Then we placed our hands upon the table, and raised them up about one foot, and the table followed up the same height. The doctor then took a common accordeon, held it by the bottom, with thumb and finger, the other hand lying on the table, and put it partly under the table, but not out of sight. I could see it distinctly, all but one side, and the upper part of the keys. I could see the bellows contract and expand to its full capacity.

It played "Sweet Home" entirely through, most beautifully, and then another piece—which I think was "The Last Rose of Summer"—equally as well. I think I never heard sweeter music. Thus closed the seance.

I can speak of what I do know when I say that no mortal hand touched the keys of that instrument, nor yet the pencil in all of that writing. The circumstances entirely precluded all chance or possibility of deception or fraud; besides, I have it from the best authority that Dr. Slade is a gentleman entirely above suspicion or reproach.

J. S. Armstrong.

Extract from "Science of Evil," By Joel Moody.

When a tree is well planted in good soil, it takes deeper root and a firmer stand by being rocked in the storms of winter. It is thus we are rocked in the storms of trouble. We are cradled in affliction and schooled in sorrow. Experience is our stern and severe teacher, who often drives us into thought by cruel torture. In this school we often suffer and despair; but without it we would never taste the delights of existence, nor behold with an appreciative eye the blending beauties of the rainbow of hope. It is the blending of light and shade which makes the picture, either on canvas or in character. Without shade there can be no picture; without Evil no character. It is the scientific skill of the artist which brings out the picture through the antagonism of light and darkness; and the scientific skill of the man or woman, which is to bring out the beautiful moral character through the antagonism of good and evil.

Voices from the People.

Gilmore, Mich.—G. B. Farley writes.—Enclosed find one dollar, for which, send the Journal to Mrs. Phebe Putney, Gilmore, Benzie County, Michigan, four months. In the absence of Post Master A. P. Bowman I am acting as a self constituted agent, soliciting help for the Journal, which will, I know, be acceptable. Volunteers come in slowly but surely, and I may enlist for life. Even here in the woods we have some good trance and inspirational mediums. These, together with the friends from the Summer Land, and the Journal, help us to keep our courage up, ready to cast our mite against old orthodoxy whenever we have an opportunity. That search after the old gent that we used to read about, is knocking the sand from under some of them.

Ripon, Wis.—S. D. Sweet writes.—You can put me down as a permanent subscriber, so long as the Journal continues to be the representative of equal rights and freedom of speech. I have been very much delighted and entertained in the "Search after God," by Brother Francis, for I, too, have been searching after the same character for these many years, but, as yet, have failed to find him. Now, by the way, would it not be well for Brother Francis in his search to keep a good look out for that other and more formidable power, sometimes called the devil, for he, too, according to popular theology, has played a very prominent part in the great drama of human life and action. I am here reminded of the Godhead—the three-headed thing, as it were. First, we have this "First God, who was from all eternity in the past, and who at length, after millions of ages had rolled away, became the Father of a Son. He was truly a wonderful child, having a virgin for his mother, and a ghost called the Holy Ghost as his sire. We told that they are both one. Strange freak in nature,—a father to be his own son, and the son to be his own father!

Brooklyn, N. Y.—Hamilton Voweray writes. I am very much pleased with the literary character of the Journal. The "Search after God" harmonizes, in almost every particular, with views I have entertained for two or three years past, ever since I have been of age.

Jefferson, Iowa.—Guy Matteson writes.—Please find inclosed one dollar and fifty cents, to pay for the paper six months past, from the 2nd of September, 1870, to March 2nd, 1871, and also fifty cents for one new subscriber, Mrs. John Coupland, Grand Junction, Iowa, for three months on trial. I wish you God speed in the good work in which you are engaged. I appreciate your kindness, and thank you very much for extending the paper past the time paid for. A word in regard to the "Search after God." When Brother Francis has ceased the labors in that direction, I wish to add my mite in trying to prevail on him to publish it in book form. I can not keep the paper, for when I see a person hungry, I feel that I must give them bread; so I hand them the Journal.

Lemars, Iowa.—A. T. Alfred writes.—I suppose my subscription has expired, but if you will be so kind as to continue the paper, you shall surely have your pay. I have become greatly interested in your "Search after God."

Lansing, Mich.—Mrs. J. Waterman writes.—Will you do me the favor to continue the paper to my address for at least four months. I have not the money by me, but will send it to you. It is due time. Am so much interested in the "Search after God," that I don't want to miss another article. I commenced as a trial subscriber the 1st of January, consequently lost several numbers of the article; still, it I can have the finishing up, I shall feel pretty well satisfied. I wish I had wealth, for the purpose of sending your valuable paper to the fireside of at least twenty families of my acquaintance who ought to be reading it. I like the paper better every week, and it feeds my soul with food that I can get in no other way, and have been hungering and thirsting for this food a long time, and in consequence have been termed an invalid for a number of years. I feel my strength increasing, and long to say to the world, "I am healed."

Stockholm, N. Y.—Brother Austin Kent, speaking of man and his origin, says: "Did he, or did he not, make himself first? We all know that earths grow men. In adding that men make earths, how much look about do you think you have it in for the orthodox? We rival it, in that the son is just as old as his father, and may have begot the father before the father begot him. Never mind,—give us the "Search."

Remarks:—The questions you have presented, have been asked by thousands of others, and we repeat again that these points will be fully considered. Be patient, Brother Kent, and follow us in our search, and we believe that you will be well satisfied with the result. By the way, we desire our readers to remember that Brother Kent is an invalid, helpless as an infant, and will you not from your ample store, remember him, and the angels will bless you. He is truly a noble man, and should be supplied with an abundance of this world's goods. His address is Stockholm, N. Y.

St. Joseph, Mo.—George M. Horine writes.—Please send the Religio-Philosophical Journal to my address, as above, on trial, as per your advertisement, for which find inclosed ten cents. Should you have on hand back numbers beginning the "Search after God," send them, and reckon my time from the beginning of the "Search." I deem those back numbers as valuable as any future number.

We regret to say that the back numbers containing the "Search after God" have all been exhausted some time ago. The articles will probably be published in book form.

Maysville, Wis.—J. Raymond writes.—The more I read the paper the more I like it, and the articles, "A Search after God," are well worth the price of the paper.

Hastings, Minn.—J. Straight writes.—Please find inclosed two dollars, which pass to my credit, and change the "yellow monitor" on my paper from Dec. 7th, 1870, to August 9th, 1871, and accept my thanks and my gratitude for the same, for when I was in arrears. The "Search after God" is worth more than a year's subscription, to say nothing of the great amount of other splendid reading matter.

Cortlandville, N. Y.—J. G. Gayers writes. Please find inclosed two dollars for the paper—one copy to J. W. Sturtevant, three months on trial,—the other to J. G. Gayers—both to one office, Cortlandville, N. Y. What an idea—to think of doing without the Journal! Enclosed find fifty spiritual papers for the last twenty-one years, and find no one equal to it, but you will excuse me for stopping the paper when I tell you that E. V. Wilson was here three days in March, and having never heard him before, I very naturally concluded that the judgment day had come at last, as the secrets were being made known to an alarming extent, and wishing to have all things square, paid up arrearages and ordered the paper stopped, as of no use for the paper, and that I would continue the "Search after God" for myself, and after trying two weeks, am satisfied that any farther effort in that direction is useless. I hope to send you some more subscribers soon.

Freeborn, Pa.—Minerva Stowell writes.—Mr. Francis, if celestialized in man-hedge control this planet, and all other planets, who controlled the first planet while the first human beings were developing?

Your questions will be fully answered during our "Search."

Willett, N. Y.—H. Hazard writes.—I am very thankful that the Journal has kept coming. It is read through first of all other papers—indeed, your "Search after God" is grand, and corresponds to ideas of mine. Keep on the track. Thus far, you have found a better than an unknown God. I admire the paper for its fearless and out spoken tone.

Fremont, Ohio.—Mrs. Harris writes.—I must say I like the paper very much, and don't see how we can do without it. Still there is one very serious objection to it, and that is, that it don't come every day in the year,—Sundays included.

NOTES BY THE WAY.

Letter from Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson.

DEAR JOURNAL:—In order to stimulate the practical work of Spiritualism in other places, I wish to call attention to matters and measures in Louisville, the point of my recent labors. I am highly gratified with the earnest zeal put forth by the Louisville Society, which is composed, in a large degree, of the very best intelligence of the city. And first, the Louisville friends stand up to the work with a true moral heroism and bravery that does not pander to popular creeds, at the same time that they prove themselves tolerant and indulgent to the honest views of their opponents. But when unjustly assailed or misrepresented, they stand firmly supported by their principles and so many overpowering arguments that even the very reverend, and of course learned, Doctors Everhart and Robinson, consider it safest to fall back and keep mum.

The Spiritualists of this wide-awake city are fine men and women, and stand at the wheel nobly. An order has been instituted, called the "Army of Progress," which combines the nature of a school or debating society, a beneficial fraternity and weekly intelligence office, (enclosed programme will explain). They have published a statement of their principles in "Articles of Association," with voluminous Scripture reference, and an "Appeal to the Clergy" appended, which is the finest little gem of the kind I have seen. Every Spiritualist should have a copy, and it is well to have them in your book list; price, probably about ten cents.

Since leaving Louisville, I have more critically examined the work, and a desire to bring it before the people has been the result.

There is a large amount of mediumship in this city and vicinity. Mrs Keigwin, of Jeffersonville, Ind., and Mrs. Hollis, 917 Portland avenue, Louisville, are mediums of the very highest order. They are both remarkable in slate writing, and I am told that in dark circles audible voices are frequent. Of Mrs. Hollis, I received most striking tests from my dear departed. At Mrs. Keigwin's, in addition to writing, a hand presented itself in broad daylight, reaching out from the table-cover, gave me a hearty clasp, took a stem of the bleeding heart (a flowering shrub) just brought in by a lady, pulled off a heart and threw it at my feet. A half dozen persons saw it.

A little Jewish girl in the city is developing as a slate-writing medium, and, I am told, is quite satisfactory.

In the society, I found two very efficient young men, converted from the Jewish faith, who are doing eminent service.

Verily, Spiritualism is the religion of the nations. I left Louisville with the addition of a rich friendship and sense of practical care which was bestowed upon me in the luxury of a good, comfortable room, where my weary brain could escape the excitement of public life, and facilitate my advantages for private work in our blessed cause.

How different this tender, thoughtful care of speakers from the mistaken hospitality of a crowd in one's room, to torture the last spark of quiet from the needed hours of rest. Oh, when will Spiritualists cease to trot out their speakers to the demands of a prying crowd, or keep them tied to the post of public exhibition? Do they know what a slow but sure eating away of life it is, for a sensitive medium, to be compelled to feed the capricious, curious, and vampire stomachs of those who hang upon us when they can? For instance, a whole party come to visit you to-day; to-morrow you are expected to spend the day with some friend, and go through the same role; the next day again, and the next, and the next.

You speak in the morning of a Sunday. Of course in the afternoon you may be on exhibition, as far as the poor ignorant ones know or care. Some "have been to their own church," or to some other church, because, for things, they thought it more popular, but in the afternoon they "will go around and see her, and find out something about her," for they "do not know that it would be right" to go to a lecture Sunday morning, when a church door is open; so they think to learn all about her, and "her sort of preaching," and if it's "right," they will come in the evening! Very patronizing! And so they come, and so they go, and at night you are treated to a smile of approbation,—for isn't there a crowd, and isn't the minister there, and another, and another? This does not apply to Louisville, but to some other places.

And now, I say to the friends everywhere, do not deprive your speakers of their quiet, and complete facilities for the work; and especially remember, our best work is now a public one, and we can no longer submit to the frittering away of our precious time and powers. We must not be expected to visit; it is to superficial, too profitless, too dangerous. Neighborhood tattle don't mix well with our Spiritualism; and family troubles we can not help. We are not vicarious atonement for all your ills. But give us the opportunity, and we will plead with voice and pen to such purpose that some day the causes of your present trouble shall be removed—or modified, at least.

What a fault-finding people we have grown to be! How ungrateful for our liberties and our blessings! This day a deputation, instead of soul complains to me that "our land" will not bring "twenty," instead of "ten thousand dollars!" Poor soul, with a fortune left, how poor! Had she the light and love of Spiritualism, how rich she might feel.

But I have somewhat digressed. I found in Alton, Ind., a comfortable Spiritual Church, but regret that it stands empty most of the time. There is no home work, no conference, no debating school, and, of course, little interest but a spasmodic one, except with the very few. What a pity this building can not be used constantly! Here I gave four lectures, to full houses, and the Methodist meeting of Sunday night adjourned to our temple.

I hope the friends will have the services of other speakers till they become a weekly institution with them. More anon.

Louisville, Ky.

THE CLEVELAND DISCUSSION.

Thanks to E. V. Wilson.

At the close of the evening lecture, Mr. D. W. Pratt, President of the Society, suggested that some expression of the sense of the meeting be taken in regard to the able manner in which our Brother E. V. Wilson had conducted the discussion just closed, terminating in a triumphant vindication of the Spiritual Philosophy, whereupon Mr. D. A. Eddy took the floor, and remarked in substance briefly as follows:

MR. PRESIDENT, LADIES AND GENTLEMEN: A great intellectual combat has just transpired between our worthy Brother E. V. Wilson on the one hand, and in defence of, the Spiritual Philosophy, on the one side, and Rev. Clark Braden, on the part, and in defence of, Orthodox Christianity, on the one hand, and against Modern Spiritualism on the other. It is not for me to say who has come off victorious, or that is a matter reserved for each, each and all, to decide for themselves. For my part, I am glad,—yes, more than glad, I am thankful beyond expression, that the strength and soundness of our philosophy has been put to the test, and in my judgment proved itself impregnable at every point of attack, and still worthy of our continued confidence and support.

It is, perhaps, well for us, now that the conflict is over, to consider what good has resulted, what lessons have been taught by this exciting discussion.

For more than two years, Bro. Wilson had been trying to locate a discussion of this kind in Cleveland. He at length succeeded in arranging the preliminaries after a protracted correspondence with the gentleman above referred to, who had the courage and confidence in himself to undertake a work which few men on his side of the question would have dared to encounter.

Accustomed as we are to hearing all on one side, it is well for us to have an opportunity of listening occasionally to what can be brought against our philosophy, and especially from one who comes strongly endorsed, not only by his particular church, but by the evangelical churches generally among his acquaintance. For ten consecutive evenings you listened to the arguments pro and con. The final summing up was an index to the strength of both parties. The decision of the verdict is with you. I have no doubts of the nature of that verdict. And now that our worthy brother has, without compensation, in dollars and cents, given his time and talents for the benefit of our cause, and for each of us individually, I propose, as a matter of simple justice, to show that we are not ungrateful, but appreciate the labors and self-sacrificing spirit which has, during our entire acquaintance with him, been exhibited on all occasions, that a vote of thanks be tendered by this Society for the triumphant vindication by him of our religion, which has just resulted from this important discussion. I, therefore, suggest that all who are in favor of such vote of thanks will please manifest by rising. The result was, as might have been expected, almost unanimous. Those who remained seated, did not attend the discussion.

Cleveland, Ohio, March 18th, 1871.

Testimonial—Mrs. Calkins, the Medium.

This is to certify that I had a running sore on my foot for four years. During the time, I have had it treated by several doctors without much effect, and had given up all hopes of getting it cured until I applied to Mr. and Mrs. F. W. Calkins. They told me that they would guarantee a cure. Thinking that good news, I told them I would give them a trial, and in seven week's time, it was perfectly cured, enabling me to wear a boot as well as on the other foot.

GRAMMAR.

The writer of this useful book has had a practical experience in the art of teaching of upwards of thirty years. He had long been dissatisfied that a shorter pathway to grammar than that which led through the perplexing subtleties of the text books could be secured, and with much devised his "Seven-Hour system" of oral teaching. Appeals from his audiences and requests from correspondents abroad became so numerous and repeated, that he was compelled to put his ideas into print to satisfy the public demand. His discoveries in the science are many and startling, reducing the labor, in many instances, from years to minutes; the limited governing power of the Transitive Verb from 20,000 words to seven; his rotating or vibrating mode of securing syntactical agreement between the Verb and Noun; his exposition of the Subjunctive Mood and Preposition, with many other interesting features of the system, are not only original, but with every great propriety be considered inspirational. These are of the utmost value to the the public writer, the platform speaker, the clergyman, or the senator. Fifteen minutes attention to any one of them will protect any intelligent person from erring once in a lifetime.

It is got up in pamphlet form of about 50 pages, with large plain type, and for the present is not sold

THE PSALMS OF LIFE,

A COMPILATION OF PSALMS, HYMNS,

ANTHEMS,
CHANTS,
ETC.,

Embodying the Spiritual, Progressive, and Reformatory Sentiment of the Present Age. By John S. Adams.

This work has been prepared with special reference to the large and increasing demand for a volume expressing the sentiments and views of the advanced minds of the present times, and meeting the requirements of every species of Reform. It is entirely free of Sectarianism, of all the theological dogmas of the past, and fully recognizes the presence and ministration of Spirit, in every condition of life on earth.

The book contains five hundred and twenty-two choice Selections of Poetry, with suitable music on each page from Handel, Hadyn, Mozart and Other Distinguished Composers.

It combines the advantage of "Hymn and "Tune" Book. It is perfected with a Complete Table of Subjects, and Complete Indexes of First Lines, Tunes and Metres; and being of convenient size, is generally accepted as the Standard Music Book of Spiritualism, Radicalism and General Reform.

alike desirable for the LECTURE-ROOM and the HOMES OF THE PEOPLE.

"I think there is in the book a great proportion—80 I think I ought to say, a greater proportion—of beautiful and truly spiritual poetry than in any other collection I have seen, whatever the size of the volume."

Rev. John Pierpont.

MEDIUMS'
DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory, giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. It is will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the location of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time, that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a lamentable fact that some mediums so far forget their self respect as to speak evilly of other mediums, not unfrequently even of those who are far their superiors. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Register so soon as we have evidence conclusive of their indulging in such misdemeanor.

It should be borne in mind that individuals visiting medium carry conditions with themselves—to speak—which aid or destroy the power of spirits to control the medium visited; because a medium gives satisfaction to certain persons, another better to others—all having their place, and all equally honest and useful in their place.

GREAT INDUCEMENTS OFFERED TO AGENTS

Having been Western Agent for Orton's Patent Preparation for the past year, I have had my good opinion of said Preparation fully confirmed by the most indubitable testimony from nearly every state in the Union, and believing it to be one of the greatest discoveries of the day, calculated to do untold good, and to have an immense sale as its merits become known, I have made a contract with the owner of the patent, whereby I have the exclusive control of the article throughout the territory of the United States, and I desire to secure in each state and territory (except the states of Illinois and Maine) an active, reliable man or company, with a capital of $1,000 or more, to take the exclusive control of the sale of the Preparation in their respective states. I make very liberal arrangements with such parties.

Parties desiring an honorable and profitable business, or to increase an already established business, and who can fill the bill, are invited to correspond with the undersigned.

"A Story of Life in its True Features."

REBECCA;

A WOMAN'S SECRET.

BY MRS. CAROLINE FAIRFIELD CORBIN;

AUTHOR OF "UNCLE TIMOTHY; OR OUR BIBLE CLASS."

12mo. 440 pages.

Real Life unfolded in a story of great beauty and power. Society sifted—the good and bad shown in fearful contrast; woman as she is, and for what she was designed; man as he is, and for what he was designed. Society, or men and women made for each other; "set in families," after the Divine order.

A pure and noble inspiration breathes from every page of the book, and its moral tone is all that the most fastidious critic can desire.

TERMS OF THE
Religio-Philosophical Journal.

$3.00 per year; $1.50—6 months, $1—1mo.

☞ Fifty Cents for Three Months on trial TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or Post-Office Money Order, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to fifteen cents, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3.50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names ENTERED on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the coming year, with or without further reminder from this office

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to Dec. 16th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith J.—16 Dec.—0." The 0 means 1870. If he has only paid to Dec. 16th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—16 Dec.—9, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as 70 for 1870, or 69 for 1869.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL, should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

NUMBER XXXVI.

The Fancy—The Peculiarity of Impressions—Worship and Prayer—The Power of Spirits over the Embryotic Germ—Blind Tom, the Wonderful Prodigy.

[The articles do not appear in the regular order, as designated by numbers in a previous issue of the JOURNAL, on account of the length of some of them. The chapters as given will follow soon.]

Lucretia—Will you allow me to ask you some general questions. While on earth, I was constantly reading—perusing the scintillations of other's minds. In the musings of the poet, in the bubbling accents of his soul, I could seemingly detect a divine spirit. Lizzie Doten says:

"Within the heart of man there is a constant yearning
For something higher, holier, unattained,
Upward and onward, from the present turning,
Yet resting never when the point is gained;
Some unseen spirit the soul is urging,
Through childish weakness and amidlife's youth,
And day by day all souls are still converging
Nearer and nearer to the Central Source of Truth."

Did she breathe inspiration from a divine source?

Spirit—Divine in the same sense that all things are divine. The "Central Source of Truth,"—all sources of truth are central, and were so regarded, no doubt, by that gifted poetess.

Lucretia—But why are all poets imbued with the idea of the existence of a God?

Spirit—Because the controlling influence of the poet does not delve deep in philosophy. Poetry and philosophy are not generally combined in the same brain. The mission of the poet is as grand as that of the philosopher; one scatters star-dust and flowers, the other, facts and principles.

Lucretia—But here in the Spirit World is suffering. Those whom I wronged on earth were presented to me. Was that a reality?

Spirit—In one sense all the scenes that you witnessed were realities. Your own acts judged you.

Lucretia—Did not the fancy have something to do therewith? The poet has said:

"Me oft has Fancy, ludicrous and wild,
Clothed with a waking dream or houses, towers,
Trees, churches, and strange visages, expressed
In the red cinders, while with peering eyes
I gazed, myself creating what I saw."

Spirit—Fancy has nothing to do with effects lodged within the mind. The law that governs this wise arrangement knows no fancy; its works are real.

Lucretia—Why is the poet, then, always referring to this fancy?—

"Where 'mid the changeful scenery, ever new,
Fancy a thousand wondrous forms describes,
More wildly great than ever pencil drew,
Rocks, torrents, gulfs, and shapes of giant size,
And glittering cliffs on cliffs and fiery ramparts rise."

Strange that the poet should ascribe all these images to fancy.

Spirit—They did not understand the laws that govern the effects of the mind. As well rattle a pebble in your pocket without it leaving certain effects there, as to have a thought within the mind without its imparting certain influence. Certain acts produce an impression upon the mind, and the impression in turn sometimes produces the original cause. Sometimes there is a reciprocal action between the two. Music makes an impression upon the mind, and occasionally that impression becomes spontaneously musical. A young lady lately on the earth-sphere, attended an aristocratic church, where she became enraptured with the music. An effect or impression was made upon her mind. When she returned home, the impression commenced to act spontaneously, producing precisely the same music she heard at church, and that music was real to her. She was regarded as insane, and the undue importance attached to the phenomenon only aggravated the case, finally so shattering her nervous system that she died. I cannot fully explain to you now the cause of this.

Lucretius—You make the mind a wonderful machine, a recording angel, a witness-box, and claim that each one carries with him to the Spirit World his own accusers. You seem to be determined to get rid of the existence of an infinite God, leaving us none to worship.

Spirit—Worship! Child, for a moment consider. Whom would you worship? Whom would you bow down before? You claim that no one can comprehend Deity. If not, how do you know he requires you to worship him? You "can not comprehend Deity," yet your own acts say that you do comprehend him, for you worship him. You say he desires you to worship him, hence you comprehend him—comprehend those desires. No, I do not worship. Why does any one worship?—pray tell me why. The act of worship implies that you comprehend Deity. It cannot be otherwise. He who prays, and then says he can not comprehend Deity, may be doing that which this Deity despises. I would not pray, fearing my prayers might be formed on wrong conceptions, and this God would frown upon me. I only speak for myself. There is a difference between worship and prayer—a very wide difference.

Lucretius—Your ideas in regard to worship are peculiar and your reasoning strange. Then you would not have humanity worship?

Spirit—If I could comprehend your God and understood he desired it, I certainly would worship him. It seems to place the worshiper in a ludicrous position when he says his Deity is incomprehensible, and still he comprehends him enough to know that he desires to be worshiped. A being that is incomprehensible stands in the same relation to humanity that the idiot does, whose incoherent mutterings no one can understand.

Lucretius—Why are you so inconsistent?

Spirit—I am only reasoning. If the temple falls under the influence of logic such as I give expression to, no harm will result therefrom, for only imaginary Gods will be buried in the ruins. The Chinaman can comprehend his wooden image as easily as you can comprehend your God; the worship of the one is just as beneficial as that of the other.

Lucretius—But we know that his Josh or his graven image did not make the universe.

Spirit—But do you know that your God did the work, whom you admit that you can not comprehend? Why call the Hindoo an idolater, when he can comprehend his Deity as easily as you can yours.

Lucretius—In coming en rapport with this medium, I read the statements of a certain person that an atheistical spirit controls him, and you must be the one.

Spirit—Atheistical spirit! Wild conclusion! Oh, when will humanity learn lessons of wisdom! For many centuries I have been in the Spirit World. I am devoted to humanity, and not to God. The Christian world are devoted to God, but willing to let three-fourths of the world go to the Devil. I can comprehend humanity, or partially so, and when I hear a voice saying "I need assistance," there I go. That is the voice of the only God that will be ever heard, and I relieve the necessities of that one. The brother who fears that I am taking away from the world the belief in the existence of a God, need not be alarmed, for I shall build in the place thereof a more beautiful and enduring edifice. None need fear for the result. I have alarmed some, but I have gladdened the hearts of thousands. True, the Search is necessarily long, but the result attained will be gratifying to every mind.

Lucretius—I comprehend your position, and understand why you are thus at work, although I am not yet prepared to believe all you have to say.

Spirit—I have shown to you the utter uselessness of worship. From the very nature of things, no good can be accomplished thereby.

Lucretius—But you make a distinction between prayer and worship.

Spirit—Most assuredly I do.

Lucretius—Wherein?

Spirit—Worship is adoration, admiration of a Deity, his attributes and controlling influence, though all may be imaginary. Prayer is supplication, entreaty, and in one sense is regarded as worship. Prayer, as I have said before, may be beneficial to some.

Lucretius—Christ prayed: "Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven."

Spirit—But he was simply a man—a medium—living in an age of the world when it seemed necessary to recognize an all-powerful, over-ruling providence. The statements in regard to his origin are base fabrications; have no foundation whatever.

Lucretius—But was not his birth predicted, and did not a star guide the wise men of the East?

Spirit—There was a spirit circle that controlled the embryotic growth and birth of Jesus. It is true that his advent was predicted. The angels spoke to the shepherds and said, "I bring you glad tidings of great joy, for this day a Savior has been born." The Chinese philosopher, Confucius, also predicted his coming. John the Baptist foreshadowed his advent when he said, "There cometh one mightier than I after me, the latchet of whose shoes I am not worthy to stoop down and unloose." The Star of Bethlehem was merely a phosphorescent light made by the angel band who had charge of Jesus, and resembled a star of the first magnitude. During the embryotic growth of Jesus, at certain periods, this circle showered down upon it their magnetic and electric influences, and developed it for a grand work. It was this that St. Luke meant when he said, "He was filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb."

Lucretius—Each step you take in the discussion of this question, only renders more plain your mission to place everything within the power of finite intelligences.

Spirit—I regard nothing as providential. I do know that guardianship commences with the embryotic germ, when brought en rapport with matter, to come forth in accordance with laws that always existed. St. Luke had an idea of this when he alluded to Jesus as being filled with the Holy Ghost.

Lucretius—How fertile your resources in endeavoring to take all things out of the hands of an Infinite God.

Spirit—I see the embryotic germ in the womb. How easily it can be influenced. The aspen leaf will move under the influence of a breath of wind that you can not sense or feel. This germ under the influence of a spirit circle, is made to move its position, although the mother does not recognize the fact. The mediumistic development of Jesus was commenced with his embryotic life, and certain tendencies given to his mind. The embryotic germ derives its nourishment from the mother, and is developed mentally through the action of her mind and the guardian spirit circle,—to God has anything to do with it.

Lucretius—Did not God originate the germ, or organize the laws that produced them?

Spirit—I tell you emphatically, No! In the growth and development of each one, you recognize only individual intelligences. In that respect, at least, you are independent of a God. In due time I will explain his origin, if he had any.

Lucretius—What is the object of guardian circles interfering with the embryotic germ?

Spirit—To give the mind such tendencies as will enable it to accomplish a particular purpose. You have heard of that prodigy of earth, Blind Tom?

Lucretius—Yes.

Spirit—Here is an example of the operation of a circle of spirits who desired to bring into the world a prodigy. They commenced with his embryotic life. His mother was a small woman, of beautiful form, and of an active, merry temperament. Her own nature was in harmony with the purposes of the spirit circle who had this embryotic germ in charge. The result was a prodigy,—Blind Tom. In one respect the world has not had his equal. The circle of spirits who had charge of his embryotic growth were superseded by one who had a master musician at its head. It is now through spirit influence that he executes the most difficult pieces. When he addresses an audience, it is while under the influence of his guides, and he always speaks of himself in the third person. Before he was two years of age, he exhibited his wonderful musical powers. His voice was then strong, soft, and melodious. Such prodigies are allowed to exist for a particular purpose, and developed by a spirit circle sending down upon the germ child, their magnetic and electric influences in such a manner as to bring about the desired result.

Lucretius—I am appalled at your statements.

Spirit—His soul is all music, tuned to the sweetest melodies. He can not read, and only knows the alphabet, as a certain sound of the piano designates a letter. He is really a wonder-[illegible]lan a designated result always be [illegible]h cases? [illegible]always. Experience is a grand [illegible]each you a lesson by and by, in regard to embryotic growth and development, such as the world has never heard. The mind of the mother even, has a wonderful influence over the child nestling in the womb. At a certain stage of its growth, lascivious thoughts or conversation on the part of the mother, will plant the seeds of licentiousness in the nature of her child.

Lucretius—I should not think this very exalted work on the part of spirits.

Spirit—Puny child, your thoughts resemble a gnarled oak, or a stunted shrub. The mission of spirits is not to sing psalms, or thrum golden harps around the throne; and many times that work which seems the most unbecoming, is the most beautiful and grand. The good accomplished by the operation of spirits in this manner, can not be over-estimated. When one faculty is so largely developed, others necessarily suffer. Blind Tom would not live a week, if all his other organs were as largely developed as that of music,—called by phrenologists, Tune. I have aimed to teach you an important lesson. Gradually I am approaching that period when this intricate question will be solved, and the world recognize the truthfulness of my position. I will show you the action of individualized intelligence; banish the cloud of doubt that hovers over you, and portray the true destiny of each one. Then be not alarmed. Yours must be an active life. You can not fold your arms in idleness. Look down upon the toiling millions of earth; even there you can find a field for labor. Go forth, then, Lucretius, and with charity beaming in your countenance, and your tongue filled with words of love for the needy and desponding, work for humanity, and great shall be thy reward.

Lucretius—But I desire to ask a few more questions.

Spirit—Proceed then.

Lucretius—I have been led to ascribe divine agencies connected with the development of Jesus.

Spirit—Yes; I fully understand your position. While you are willing to admit that God was connected with his embryotic growth and development, you think it beneath the dignity of spirits to be engaged in like work, and while the Christian world believes that he is employed in assisting humanity, they think that only evil spirits are interested in the affairs of earth, and only they can communicate. The children of earth have yet a grand lesson to learn.

Lucretius—In what direction?

Spirit—In not believing it beneath the dignity of spirits to do what they claim God is constantly doing. It was perfectly proper for God to fill Jesus with the Holy Ghost during his embryotic growth, but they would esteem it the height of folly and impudence for a circle of scientific spirits to shower down upon the embryotic germ of Blind Tom their magnetic and electric influences, in order to give certain tendencies to his mind.

Lucretius—But have spirits no more exalted work than that?

Spirit—Poor child, in your opinion it is undignified for spirits to do what you ascribe to God,—experience will engraft within your mind new ideas. Guardianship commences with each embryotic germ in the womb, and the aim of the guardian,—sometimes a circle of a hundred spirits,—is to impart to the mind certain idiosyncracies.

Lucretius—But how is development caused?

Spirit—By either bringing out all the organs in harmonious relations, or just developing one, as in Blind Tom. This is easily done when understood. The spirit circle only bring to bear certain influences that correspond with that possessed by every mother, and thus assist "nature" in her work.

Lucretius—I fear the children of earth are not prepared for this advanced position.

Spirit—This is only what the Christian world have acknowledged for centuries, only I ascribe to a spirit circle what they do to God. Still they will call it very undignified for spirits to do what they all admit that God has done. The world must advance,—gradually the operations of, and the idea of a God doing anything, will be banished.

Lucretius—It seems so undignified for spirits to be engaged in developing an embryotic germ.

Spirit—But not undignified or unbecoming for your God to shower down upon the embryotic Jesus the Holy Ghost, or send forth a lying spirit, that King Ahab might be destroyed. Not undignified for angels to liberate Peter, roll away the stone from the door of the sepulchre, dine with Abraham, write Mene, Tekel, Upharsin on the wall, and talk with Hagar in the wilderness. You are a mere child in wisdom,—but soon will be convinced of the truthfulness of what I state.

Lucretius—You state nothing impossible. Early education has biassed my views, and I may seem weak to you.

(To be continued.)

The Work Was Well Done.

The Legislature of Michigan, on considering the remonstrances which were printed in this paper and circulated throughout the State of Michigan, and by the people of that State signed and sent to that body, rejected the so-called "Doctor's Bill," by a large majority, a few days since.

About the time the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL took this subject in hand, the Legislature of Michigan passed the law, but immediately reconsidered the vote, and when the same came up again for a final vote, the people, under the lead of Spiritualists, had pronounced so emphatically against such a law—a law to fine and imprison healing mediums,—that the eyes of senators and representatives were opened to the perception of a power more potent than the will of quack doctors of the "Regular Schools." The Bill was defeated by an overwhelming majority.

Poor old grannies! What will they do next? They have made a botch of the job all round. They and the Catholics, with a hearty backing by the pious hypocrites of the various Protestant churches, set out last winter, to make a clean sweep of spirit mediums in the West. They began by having them arrested in this city, under an old, obsolete city ordinance, unconstitutional and unjust, and which has always remained a dead letter until attempted to be enforced against mediums under a charge of being fortune tellers.

As we have before published, they were signally defeated in that movement. We started the supposed criminals on the right track for an able defense—such a legal defense by our friend Peters, that no judge could gainsay; a defense that rested in the fundamental law,—the Bill of Rights of the American people.

The JOURNAL took up the "Doctor's Bill," and exposed it single handed and alone! The people were inspired by it, to a most thorough resistance of such a law. It has been defeated in Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Nebraska, Missouri and Arkansas; and but for the vigorous action of this paper, it is true beyond controversy that the doctors would have been successful in each of the above-named States, in getting their bills passed. Under this state of facts we feel confident that all Spiritualists, as well as all correct thinkers and liberal-minded people, will accord to the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, the praise of having put in motion the necessary requisites for a successful defeat of a measure fraught with great evil and injustice to mediums and the cause of Spiritualism. They will say the work was well done.

Letter of Fellowship.

On the 15th of April, the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY granted a Letter of Fellowship to Bro. P. C. Mills, of Brooklyn, N. Y., constituting him in legal parlance, "a regular minister of the gospel," which authorizes him to solemnize marriages according to law.

Correction.

We inadvertantly did the authors of the "Hollow Globe" an injustice, by saying that the chapter upon "World Builders" was concluded, when it was only about half published. We should have said it was crowded out by a press of other matter. The whole chapter, and in fact the whole book, should be read in order to be appreciated.

J. C. Wilkenson.

The above-named brother received from the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, on the 28th of March last, a Letter of Fellowship, which constitutes him "a regular minister of the gospel," and authorizes him to solemnize marriages according to law. We hope the time is not far distant when Spiritualists will bestow the pursuites incident to the marriage ceremony upon our lecturers, instead of giving them to orthodox clergymen, who everywhere speak evilly of our faith, and revile Spiritualists, even as the old Jews did the Nazarene and his followers.

Brother Wilkenson's address is No. 58 John street, Toledo, O.

Harry Bastian.

A few days ago, Harry Bastian was at our office, when two young men, P. M. Foster and H. C. Robinson, thought they would "try the spirits," and so procured about sixty feet of wrapping cord which the strongest man could not break, and tied Harry's arms and hands in every conceivable manner, and then brought them back of his head, where they were secured in such a way that he could not move them. Thus secured he stepped into a darkened room, and within five minutes was liberated from his uncomfortable position by his spirit friends, much to the astonishment of those who had tied him.

Mr. Bastian starts this week eastward where he will remain until about the 1st of August. Those who desire his services in the East, will find him one of the very best mediums.

Spirit Artist.

Mr. Willis, the Spirit Artist of Indiana, has opened a gallery at northwest corner of Clark and Madison streets, in Chicago, where he is engaged in taking spirit likenesses. He has been here but four or five days. Although he has had several fair results, yet but few, comparatively speaking, as yet get pictures sufficiently perfect to be recognized. Mr. Willis attributes this to the fact that the gallery, instruments, etc., etc., are not yet properly magnetized with spirit aura to enable spirits to materialize themselves, to reflect light sufficiently to leave their image upon the plate through the camera.

To those, Spiritualists who are familiar with physical manifestations by spirits, the argument is plausible, and probably well founded. We have seen several good likenesses taken by him since he came to Chicago.

We are very glad that Mr. Willis has commenced operations in this city, and hope he will be well patronized by Spiritualists.

Thanks.

BROTHER JONES:—I send you with the money enclosed, the names of twenty-two new subscribers for your world-leading paper, commencing with next week's issue.

RUFUS WILSEY.

Summitville, Iowa, April 15, 1871.

REMARKS—We join with our angel friends in tendering our sincere thanks to our brother for his effort to circulate the JOURNAL, a paper not second to any one published in America. Many others (names too numerous to mention) have interested themselves in our behalf, and sent us many new subscribers, and for so doing, the angel world will reward them.

Will a few thousand other subscribers make a like effort in its behalf?

Physical Mediums.

Mrs. Maud Lord still continues to hold seances in the city, convincing those in attendance, of the truths of the Harmonial Philosophy. The Banks children are also engaged in the good work.

Prof. Denton and the Joint Committee.

We call the attention of our readers to the able manner in which Prof. Denton met the enquiries of the "Joint Committee on Parishes and Religious Societies," in Boston, March 1st, 1871. The article in question was taken from the BANNER, and shows the inquisitorial spirit of the Committee, and the fearless responses of Professor Denton and others. The questions exhibit the weakness of the Committee, and the responses can only be gratifying to every liberal mind.

To Mechanics and Others Desirous of Procuring a Nice Home.

The season of the year has arrived, or is close at hand, when many will be looking for new homes. We know of no place in the vicinity of Chicago, which offers better facilities for beautiful homes than the growing town of ST. CHARLES, situated on Fox River, the most beautiful stream of water in Illinois, only thirty-seven miles by railroad west of Chicago.

This town now contains three thousand inhabitants. It is situated at the south end of a tract of timber seven miles in length, along the river, and three miles wide. This tract of timber lies between the city of Elgin and St. Charles, which are only ten miles apart. St. Charles is two miles north of Geneva, the county seat of Kane County, four miles from Batavia, and twelve miles north of the city of Aurora.

The Fox River Valley is conceded by everybody to be the richest and most lovely section of the State of Illinois. St. Charles is situated on two gently-inclined planes extending nearly a mile back, on each side of the river, from the water's edge.

A more beautiful site for a town—with a pure atmosphere, free from diseases of every kind—is not to be found anywhere, east or west.

Fox River is a rapid stream, affording ten fine sites and water-power within the county of Kane, the best of which is at St. Charles, as the bed of the river, twenty-eight rods in width, is smooth and firm limestone.

This town now has two flouring mills, one paper mill, a foundry, planing mills, several good stores, public halls, fine buildings, etc.

We know of no opening in the West which promises better returns for capital invested, be it for the simple mechanical or the most extensive manufacturing company. Water power for a large business can be had on reasonable terms, and town lots are very cheap. Two good lumber yards render competition such as to be beneficial to the purchasers.

We have now on hand a large number of lots, some with small houses on them, for sale on easy terms, ranging from seven hundred dollars (including the building) upward, according to site, quantity of land, and finish of houses.

An early train leaves the town daily, by which business men will reach Chicago at a quarter before nine each morning. As a manufacturing town, for any kind of business, artizans will find it every way desirable,—just far enough from Chicago to live cheap, and not too far for convenience.

We have a large brick building, three stories high, 50x80 feet, well adapted for manufacturing boots and shoes, harness work, silver-plating establishment, or almost any kind of mechanical business where good light is desirable,—now ready for use.

Small lots of from one to ten acres can be purchased in the immediate vicinity of the town, at extremely low figures, and on terms to accommodate any man's means.

There are two first-class graded schools in the town, each having five departments. Only the best teachers are engaged in them; thus very fine facilities are afforded to the young for a superior education, free from the many dangers attendant upon living in the larger cities. We have also a weekly newspaper, second to none in the county for ability and enterprise.

To our Spiritualist friends we would say, that St. Charles contains already a large per cent. of outspoken Spiritualists. They and the Universalists occupy, by agreement, a nice meeting-house—a large proportion of the Universalists being avowed believers in spirit communion.

Dr. D. P. Kayner, late of Erie, Pa., has recently located at this place, and is, as the readers of this paper are aware, one of the most popular lecturers in the field, as well as a first-class healing medium.

Now, we have to say to our friends who are looking for good, pleasant homes in the West, and especially those who may be engaged in mechanical pursuits, either single-handed, a company, or who wish to form a co-operative community, and expect to depend, to a considerable extent, upon the Chicago Market, do not fail to visit St. Charles before locating elsewhere.

We speak of it in good faith, and confident that those who make St. Charles a home (as we have from its infancy to the present time) will find it every way desirable.

Any one wishing special information upon any subject connected with the town, or wishing to buy property there, can address us at our real estate office, 189 S. Clark St., Chicago, Ill., and rely on a prompt reply.

JONES & BUNDY.

Personal and Local.

—The Rev. Mr. Taylor, a divine of commanding influence and talents, stationed at Fort Scott, Kansas, has been expelled from the Methodist Church. His friends have raised his salary in consequence, and he is still preaching. One of the charges preferred against him was, giving notice of a spiritual lecture on the Sabbath from the pulpit, etc. No man stands higher in the estimation of the people than Mr. Taylor, and his expulsion from the church will finally result in great good to him.

—Mrs. L. T. Mann, 249 South 12th street, Philadelphia, is a healing and test medium. Answers sealed letters.

—W. R. Barringer, of Goldsboro, N. C., desires a good physical medium to visit that place.

—Mary Thomas Clark gives an interesting account of the meeting of the Progressive Friends at Osborn Prairie, Ind., on the 8th inst. She delivered an address on the occasion. She speaks in high terms of a physical medium residing there. Through her mediumship spirits talk in audible voices, and give some remarkable tests.

—The Spurrier House, Louisville, Ky., with its comfortable accommodations and central location, makes a very convenient stopping place for visitors to that enterprising city.

—Mrs. Jorgenson, rooms 28 and 29, Honore Block, is a most excellent medium, and worthy of patronage. She is a symbolic seer and inspirational speaker.

—Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson has been meeting with great success at Troy, and other places in Indiana. Packed houses greeted her, and great interest was manifested in her lectures. She is now laboring at Terre Haute, Ind.

—Brother Christlieb informs us that Mrs. Mary J. Calhoun's lectures at Long Lake, Minn., are well received.

—Mrs. Orrin Abbott, the developing medium, whom we have previously noticed as having returned to this city, and opened an office at room 5, 190 South Clark street, is meeting with unusual success in her profession.

—Brother W. M. Conolly will answer calls to lecture in the West and Northwest. His address is Louisville, Ky.

—Rev. D. W. Hull has finished up his lectures in Providence, and goes next to Corry, Pennsylvania, where he will remain until the middle of May. From there he goes to Wyandotte, Michigan, and speaks one week. He returns to Hobart, May 21. He will attend the Mediums' and Speakers' Convention at Decatur, in June.

—J. O. Barrett, State Missionary, will lecture in Richland Centre, Sunday, April 30th; in Patch Grove, Grant County, Sunday, May 7th. Friends in the vicinity of either of these places, wishing for week evening lectures following the above appointments, can address the missionary at Glen Benish, Sheboygan County, Wisconsin.

—Sister H. E. Pope has lectured four times at North Branch Station, Minn., giving some remarkable tests. North Branch Station is one half hour's ride from St. Paul, Minn.

—Good reports reach us from Bell A. Chamberlain, who has been lecturing in various parts of Iowa. Brother W. P. R., writing from Clear Lake, Iowa, says: "She, or her controlling spirit, has few equals for eloquence, logic, or command of language."

—Brother A. B. B. informs us that J. T. Rouse has been lecturing with great success at Monterey, Ohio.

—Eliza Tellow thinks that a good lecturer and test medium would do well at Cuba, Mo.

—S. P. Chute, Syracuse, N. Y., is a good clairvoyant and healer.

Narrative of a Dark Spirit.

NUMBER FIVE

By Dr. John W. Hughes, (formerly of Cleveland.)

I am glad to be permitted to give you some facts in regard to our friend, whose condition has awakened so deep an interest here and with you. Each spirit who is thus enabled to present an account of this spirit, must do it from their own stand-point, and according to what they see and feel in relation to him.

As I have had some interviews with his father and mother, I shall go back a little further than any one has yet done, and endeavor to trace out some of the causes that have produced the fearful conditions which he has experienced.

His mother tells me that she was a young gipsy girl, not quite sixteen years old when he was born, a gay, giddy child, with a voluptuous nature, quite ignorant of the world, and with a deadly hatred towards the child that was to be hers. She had been a wanderer all her life, and was brought under the influence of the father of her child at the confessional. He was a Jesuit Priest, a gross, sensual man, with a very large back brain—with strong animal passions, very imperfectly concealed by the hypocrisy required for such a man in the profession of the priesthood. He induced this thoughtless child to leave her associates and visit him occasionally, until he found she was about to become a mother, when he not only abandoned her, but forbade her coming near him or exposing him under pain of eternal torment.

These facts I gathered from them, and the lesson I draw is this, that young Antonio, the child of this unequal and lustful union of persons so different in age, temperaments, etc., inherited the fearful, uncontrollable passion to commit the disgusting crimes of which he has spoken to you. The reckless and fierce love of the young mother, and the fiendish and lustful passions of the father were entramped upon him.

I need say nothing of his earthly career, as he has already given you as full an account as is necessary. I may say that we could read the terrible impressions of that life when we first saw him; but I will not dwell on the law of conditions, as set forth by our friend, Dr. Ardley.

Having myself been a victim of temptations of various kinds, mainly through the use of intoxicating liquors, it has been my mission to him to watch the interior impulses of his soul nature, and guard him in the hour of temptations. All physical violations are cumulative in their tendencies—that is, like an obstructed stream of water—the force gathers until the barriers which have been set up, or even the natural banks give way, and the flood overflows. We have seen poor human nature resolve and re-resolve, struggling and falling over and over again, because the conditions were such that their spirits did not realize the power that was accumulating and gathering itself strength as would enable it to sweep away all the restraints.

Habits, whether good or evil, are continually being strengthened by repetition, and the only means of permanent reform consists in loving, confiding, truthful associations with other spirits—some true and loving spirit, congenial and active that must be found, to whom confession must be made full, free and unrestrained, and who, under proper intuitions can clearly discover the gathering strength of the power that will overwhelm the soul. When this discovery is made and proper assistance is rendered, the individual can be protected.

This has been my particular mission to this spirit, though he was not like me, a victim to the intoxicating cup, yet the same law applies to these lustful feelings which have been his for so long a period. Other spirits have been aiding us in this work. One of the greatest difficulties which spirits experience, is to obtain confidence in others, so that they may be thus free to confess and acknowledge their conditions, for without this freedom no good can result from it.

To know one's self diseased, is half a cure, and all such spirits find it exceedingly difficult to get the first half of this knowledge.

So soon as he was awakened to a slight consciousness of his condition, the work was begun. The result of his influences upon that poor child of earth were manifested, first to those around her by spirits; but he was totally unconscious of it, and did not believe it when you spoke of it to him.

This unconscious condition of crime is the most fearful state into which the human soul can fall. It is a hell which can only be escaped from through the most intense and agonizing suffering, and he was mistaken in the declaration, that nothing could be worse than his present condition, when you first attracted his attention.

He has suffered much more intensely since that, and has often exclaimed, "My punishment is greater than I can bear," though this was not the case, on the contrary this is the only means by which he can escape from the low condition of indifference and crime, into which he had fallen.

Let no child of earth deceive themselves with the thought that they can violate any law and escape the penalty. I would most solemnly impress upon those who have lost all compunctions of conscience in regard to any acts which one's spirit whispers to them, and who feel indifferent in regard to any acts which they once knew to be wrong, that these are conditions from which there is but one gateway of escape, and that is through intense and long continued remorse and anguish of spirit.

We labor here and with mortals to keep individuals, who are thus suffering from entire despair, and to encourage them as far as we may, even amid their deepest sufferings, that they shall come out of these terrible conditions as gold purified and refined in the fire. At the same time we are not permitted to remove these legitimate sufferings, they must be endured, and with us as with you, external surroundings are to be considered, and hence, we took this spirit away from the places which he had been accustomed to occupy, and from all his old associates, and we have been attending upon him with great care and loving kindness, and whenever a feeling of desire to return to his former habits and haunts has arisen, we have checked it, and restrained him. The forces that have been brought to bear upon him have been the result of the combined action of a large number of spirits together, with the sympathies of earthly friends.

We have received considerable aid from those whose interest has been awakened by the publication of these narratives, all such sympathy comes to us, and is added to the general fund.

Our treatment of the erring differs widely from that of earth, where you seem to be compelled to use bolts and bars and prison walls, because there are not enough assistants, and you are not sufficiently intuitive to perceive the movings of the interior spirits of those whom you would reform.—Our plan is far more successful, because we have as many assistants as are needed, and some, whose intuitive powers are so unfolded, that they readily perceive the interior conditions before they have expressed themselves in the external plane.

Every step that is gained we endeavor to secure, so that there can be no falling back, and this marks a distinction between such reforms in spirit-life and on earth.

With you there can not be such guardianship over the weak and erring ones, and hence, they frequently fall back into worse and worse ones. Here a number of spirits enter upon the work earnestly and devotedly, and they make such arrangements that they never leave the spirit alone, until the danger of relapse is over. Around this spirit there have been gathered above circle of spirits, deeply interested in the work of his reformation; but only a few of these spirits have, as yet, been visible to him, and if those who were visible to him were withdrawn, as was sometimes the case, in order to give him as much self-reliance as possible, those who were invisible to him were attentive watchers, and were ever ready to summon those who could render more efficiently, because more material aid to him.

We have been obliged on several occasions to restrain him by physical force, from acts which would have been injurious. We treat such spirits just as you should treat the insane, and when they would injure themselves or others, restrain them, but always with love and kindness, and only to the extent necessary to the accomplishment of the work.

These sanitary police arrangements, if I may use such terms, are just as necessary here as they are among that class of mortals, when they are constantly used.

It will be a grand triumph for humanity, when the children of earth shall have learned to know how to apply these police regulations to their benighted and undeveloped fellow beings, so as to restrain them only, and not to excite their passions and increase their criminal tendencies. This is a reform of the utmost importance, which Spiritualism must introduce and carry forward in the earth-life.

Such was the happy combination of spiritual and physical forces around Antonio, that we have had but little difficulty with him. The plan was well organized and wisely directed by spirits far advanced in knowledge and goodness, and the work is going on very well, and ere long he will begin a work on earth, and the young woman will not be relieved until he can come to her as a ministering spirit for good, and we will find in him a valuable aid to our band, for the reformation of individuals who have had somewhat similar experiences.

Since they who have never been sick, can not appreciate and sympathize with those who are sick, the discipline of evil has its value, and among the most efficient workers are our crime-scarred veterans, who have gone through many a struggle and conflict with themselves, until at last they have gained the victory over themselves, and have consecrated their lives to the redemption of the world from the errors that they have helped to build up.

The highest condition that a human being can attain to, is that in which there is a desire to reach down to and help the very lowest of their fellow beings, and when this is attained there can be no condition which they would not help, if it were in their power to do so.

When the entire history of this spirit is presented to the world, it will be seen that there were many mitigating circumstances, and it would appear as if his punishment was too long continued and severe, but the laws of the transmission of evil are fixed and unalterable, and the means for the removal of such conditions are also fixed, not in vengeance, but in love, and the law of compensation runs so beautifully through all the works of our Father, that however slowly the mills of God may grind.

"Ever the right comes uppermost,
And ever is justice done."

Fragments.

Mrs. Brigham, in one of her lectures, speaking of impressibility and the fact that many persons deny the presence of spirits, because they can not see or hear, or feel them around them, said:

"If you go out in the Spring, when the apple trees are full of their beautiful blossoms, and you see a little sensitive child playing under the tree, you will notice that if a single petal falls upon its delicate head, it will perceive it.

But suppose an animal covered over with thick hair should come and lie down under that tree, it might be covered all over with those delicate and beautiful flower leaves, and it would not notice them at all."

There never was any good in the world that was not ushered in with some conflict.—M. J. T. Brigham.

Whatever has come to us as a new and beautiful truth, has always borrowed something of that which preceded it.—Ibid.

Out of the darkness of adversity springs forth the day of prosperity.—Ibid

Mind and matter are alike; known by their properties and manifestations—the proof of the one is the same as the other.

The theory of Bishop Berkeley, of the non-existence of matter, may be more readily accepted than the materialistic notion that matter exists without mind or intelligence.—Forster.

MORE LIFE.

"When spring-time prospers in the grass,
And fills the vales with tender bloom,
And light winds waft over as they pass
Of summer days to come.

In spite of all the joy she brings
To flood and field, to hill and grove,
This is the song my spirit sings,—
More light, more life, more love."

—Alice Carey.

MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD,

Healing Medium,

Has been before the public as a successful Healer the past fifteen years. We rely entirely on the controlling influences. We diagnose and give prescriptions by letter. Distance no objection. Will visit in person a reasonable distance those that desire, and can afford the expense. Delineation and advice on a variety of ways. Guidance we give gratuitously to all our patients, when presented by our guides. Our former custom has been to come en rapport with the applicant by the hand-writing or lock of hair; but to save time, and the unpleasant sensation of taking on the symptoms of the disease, we require the applicant to give age and sex, with one or two leading symptoms of the disease, written by the patient, if able to write—if not, send lock of hair. As the giving of pain is not the object which we seek, but to restore the patient to health by Nature's own hand, in the shortest time possible, we do not deem it necessary here to lumber up an advertisement with what we have done or what we can do, but prefer to be known by our fruits.

Terms, for diagnosis and prescription, $2; Diagnosis without prescription, $1; all subsequent prescriptions, $1 each. All letters should be accompanied with the fee, and addressed to MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD, Box 45, Lake Miles, Jefferson Co., Wis.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago,

Mrs. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

Mrs. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well when the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $3.00; each subsequent, $2.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $3; answering Business Letters, $2. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

LIBERAL TRACT SOCIETY.

Remarks of Prof. Wm. Denton and others, at the Second Hearing on the Incorporation of the "American Liberal Tract Society," before the Joint Committee on Parishes and Religious Societies, had at the State House, Boston, March 1st, 1871.

Concluded from last week.

Chairman—What is your name sir?

Storer—H. B. Storer.

Chairman—Do you believe all these [holding up the twelve tracts filed by the Society] to be correct?

Storer—No, I am not prepared to say so, as an individual; but I endorse the policy of Massachusetts, which is to protect the liberty of private judgement, and I desire to grant to our members the great st freedom of expression; and to that end have requested the incorporation of the Society, so that we may promulgate our ideas as well as others.

Richardson—Have you ever been oppressed or interrupted in the publication or distribution of these ideas? Have you not been protected by the spirit of the Republic?

Storer—It is true that we have not been interfered with as far as we have gone; but that is not all we want. We desire the full benefit of what the incorporation of the Society can give us

Richardson—Well, sir, suppose that the religious record of this State is diametrically opposed to you, how can you expect us to vote for the incorporation?

Storer—We do not ask the State to endorse our views, but only to give us a legal basis to work from.

Richardson—But the historical traditions of the State are against you; the will not desire to give prestige to what she does not believe.

Storer—I believe, as I have said, that it is the enlightened policy of the State to protect the right of private judgment upon all matters of religious belief—and that no private judgment can be fearless it have all sides of a question to contrast and decide upon. The tracts published by societies already incorporated, and the sentiments of which we do not believe, are freely scattered. What we want to attain is, the same facilities for spreading other views before the people. For this reason we ask for an Act of Incorporation, as we are deprived of necessary facilities for usefulness without it.

Richardson—Then you will consider yourselves persecuted if you do not get it?

Storer—Perhaps not persecuted, but deprived of our rights as citizens.

Stafford—Why do you not organize under the general laws? It does not appear by the evidence that you have presented that you have three cents in funds in the treasury, or that there is any immediate prospect of your obtaining any great increase in that direction.

Storer—I think it has been fairly shown that there has been no attempt made to collect and hold funds during the time the Society has been operating. We want the prestige which incorporation will give us; it will go a great way with the people, and we can then ask with confidence for donations.

Stafford—By the instructions of the Legislature, all Committees considering applications for incorporation are ordered first, before reporting favorably, to satisfy themselves that the Society to be incorporated cannot organize under the general law. Now what authority have we—from the evidence presented us—to report a bill to the Senate favoring the incorporation of this Society? What proof have we that you cannot organize under the general law? and what reasons have you given why you are not desirous of so doing?

Several members of the Committee—That is a point we should raise concerning any society.

Gardner—I cannot claim particular knowledge of the laws of Massachusetts, but I have been given to understand that there are more rights and privileges accorded to the members of a society under a special act of incorporation than are given by the general law on the subject. In a society organized under the general law, for instance, each of the private members is held for the debts of the whole society. Persons chosen to office under such a regime may be honest and painstaking, but if unsuccessful, or if they make mistakes through ignorance, the consequences of their errors fall upon every private member who may happen to have property upon which to levy for the society's debts. But under a special Act of Incorporation it is not so—the duties of members and officers are more clearly defined, and each man does not become responsible to the full extent of his property for the society, as under the general law. Another reason for our desire for special incorporation was that we should want to hold property in excess of the amount allowed under the general law; and it has been quite conclusively shown that no great efforts have been made to raise funds, except for the current issue of tracts—the disposition among the members being to wait till the question of incorporation is settled, whether under a special or general enactment. I know that under general laws, by reason of the ignorance, incompetence or recklessness of the officers, there is sometimes much danger, and many persons would object to belonging to an organized society each of whose members were liable to the whole extent of their individual property to pay the debts of the concern.

Chairman—Are you a citizen of the State? I judged you were not so by your saying you were not acquainted with the laws of Massachusetts.

Gardner—I am. My name is Henry F. Gardner. I have resided and been known in the city of Boston for quite a number of years. I did not mean to say that I do not know of the laws generally, but referred to those particularly applying to the case.

Chairman—Mr. Storer, you are at liberty to continue your remarks.

Storer—I gave way to allow others to answer questions asked, and to give their explanation concerning the matter of our incorporation. My question of the Chairman was a pertinent one. I thought if our act of incorporation depended upon the agreement of the committee with our views, we could not expect to get it; but if you would say, "Here are a company of men who desire to print and diffuse in society their ideas of right; let them do it according to their best judgement; if false, they can do no harm, for truth is eternal, and nothing but error will die," then we might hope for the legal working basis we desire. It seems to me that the old spirit of intolerance is not dead. We may see it to-day in the city of Boston: A gentleman—Rev. J. L. Hatch—who has of late been distributing liberal tracts in front of Tremont Temple, was arrested under a city ordinance and dragged before a justice, but was discharged upon examination on the day named, when the officers of the law give implicit obedience to the demands of churchmen. It only shows a certain spirit that still exists, and would do more if it dared. Now, I simply wish to do away with all this petty subterfuge, and let people see the truth as it is. I wish the right of publishing and distributing the tracts of this Society, so that those desiring may read them as freely as those of other societies.

Richardson—I wish to ask the gentleman if this tract distributor who was arrested did not go into the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association, and recite the Lord's Prayer in a manner to provoke ridicule?

Storer—I do not know. He is here, and can answer for himself. He was not arrested for that, however. I do not think it possible that it could be the case.

Richardson—Do you consider that you can call upon the Committee to report a bill contrary to the traditional history of the Commonwealth? Suppose there should be a society of Mormons in Boston, who desire to be incorporated that they may publish tracts advocating the practice of bigamy. If free investigation is this Committee is, should you feel called upon to report a bill recommending the incorporation of such society?

Storer—Personally, sir, I have no fear of the effect of any idea upon the minds of the people, under freedom. I believe in the maxim of Jefferson, that error may be safely tolerated where truth is left free to combat it." I should not oppose the incorporation of such a society. I should say Mormonism had as much right to be heard as any other sect. But I would oppose the publication of what are known as obscene works.

Safford—Ad you would think the Committee ought to incorporate the Mormons?

Storer—I think, at least, the Committee should report their grounds of action to the Legislature if they did refuse to incorporate them.

Safford—What would be your report if a member of this Committee? Should you favor it? that is, I ask, should you favor the advocacy of bigamy—a something opposed to the statutes the Common wealth made and provided, which declare that a man shall not have more than one wife?

Storer—No, sir; I should not favor any tracts against the laws—that is, which defied the laws but I should be in favor of putting all the arguments I could before the people to induce them to change the laws by constitutional means.

J. L. Hatch—My name is J. L. Hatch; I am by profession a clergyman—a Unitarian. I would like to answer the question that was asked about that individuals going to the rooms of the Young Men's Christian Association. I did go there, and, while there, went through with the form of the Lord's Prayer.

Richardson—Yes; but I understood it was in a spirit of mockery.

Hatch—That is a mistake. I am in the habit of using the prayer at home, and it was recited there with no different spirit. I am a clergyman—a Unitarian—speaking regularly at Scituate, on the South Shore. I wish to say that, in these inquiries put forward by your Committee, I understand the point to be as to our views—not so much as to what they may assert in the way of dogmatic statements which will militate against that justice, morality and right upon which the State is so substantially founded. If by your examinations you should be satisfied that these publications are immoral or wrong in their tendency, then you will be called upon to refuse the desired incorporation—and of right, too. But why should societies are it organized—Orthodox, Baptist, Presbyterian, or otherwise—we expect a like favor, except on the ground of immorality, which I mentioned above. If the Jews, numbering some six thousand in Boston, were to get up a society to promulgate their ideas, and ask you for an act of incorporation, you would give it, never refusing because of their religion. Perhaps, even, if the "heathen Chinee," numbering many numerous in Massachusetts, should desire an act of incorporation for a society to diffuse his ideas and peculiar religion, you would grant it. Let us have as good a chance as the rest.

Chairman—What is your idea of the Great Creator of the universe?—and whether it is governed by him?

Hatch—I believe the universe was created by God—not by any special creation, but by development.

Richardson—Was there ever any time when Nature was first called forth—when the act of creation was exercised by a Superior Power?

Hatch—I make no distinction between creation and development.

Chairman—How do you regard the inspiration of Jesus Christ?

Hatch—I think he was as all good and noble men are. I place his teachings above those of any other man who ever lived; but I believe, with my sect, that he was a man, and not God.

Richardson—Plato has said that "to act nobly and wisely, both for yourself and the State, you must act according to the will of God" Where do you find that will outside the Bible? What is your idea of the will of God?

Hatch—I understood Plato to mean according to the rule of absolute right; and I will take the saying to mean, of yourselves judge we not what is right?" We do not propose to use the rights given us by incorporation—should it be allowed—against the morals of the people of the State; on the contrary, we are in favor of God and true morality. If the Chinese should apply to you to be allowed to bring here any of their unseemly or unclean rites; if it were proposed to introduce into the State (as in some old religions mysteries) prostitution as a part of the ceremonies in the heathen temples, we should unite with all others in declaring that you should refuse to countenance these inroads upon the public morality. But the ground occupied by this Society is entirely of a different nature. Though some of its members do not call themselves Christians, still they all claim to believe in love to God and love to man.

Richardson—I desire to ask if you do not teach that a young man—say of twenty years of age—may do as he pleases—it is all right; that the Bible is not anything to him; that Christianity has no authority over him; and that he is not amenable to the rules or wishes of his parents?

Hatch—No, sir. We hold that all children should be under tutelage and government, and the State holds to each individual in the body politic a similar parental relationship. It is not our desire to lessen, but to elevate by knowledge the child's idea of right.

Richardson—But what is to be the standard? How are you going to fix a standard so that you shall know you are right in reconstructing society in any other way?

Hatch—It will be difficult to define our views, because they always change, as the world of men changes. Massachusetts has always been changing. There has been a great advance of public opinion here since the time when men who thought themselves doing God service hung Quakers on Boston Common. We only ask the same rights as are accorded to the Evangelical societies; we desire to be put on even terms with the other societies who have the right to advocate their different views. Institutional and dogmatic Christianity some of our members may wish to combat in their tracts, but they do not contravene that spirit of truth which makes Christianity to me mean love to God and love to man.

Richardson—Is there any difference between this idea and the teachings of the Bible? Why, then, take the Bible away?

Hatch—We do not throw the Bible out, but only put it on its man merits. We desire to receive its truths and to reject its errors.

Richardson—I understand Prof. Denton to say that he should labor to destroy the common notion that the Bible is the Word of God—that is, I understood him to deny the inspiration of the Bible. You desire to destroy the idea that the Word of God is in the Bible from beginning to end?

Denton—I would put the Bible to the test of truth. Such of its teachings as could stand that test I would receive, as I would the same truth were it embodied in the language of Plato, Socrates or Confucius.

Richardson—I believe the Bible is the Word of God—the whole of it.

Chairman—The time allotted to the session having expired, I am obliged to pronounce the hearing closed. If another should be deemed expedient or necessary, due notice will be given.

John C. Cluer—I desire to ask Mr. Hatch, or any gentleman present, if he or they know any one connected with this Society, or anybody being up in its principles, who is connected with or lends his countenance to the continuance of the numerous houses of ill-fame or the many rumshops now existing in the city of Boston?

The gentleman specially questioned said he did not, and no one present was able to answer the question. The inference to be drawn—as to the comparative morality of free thought and "bound religion"—was plain.

The meeting dispersed, and the champions of liberal ideas walked out to where the clear sunshine and balmy air of the Common were speaking of the coming spring, feeling in their hearts that whether incorporated or not by the subsequent action of the Committee, they had at least made one step more from mental winter in that path of progress which will certainly end in a golden harvest of broader freedom in the years that are to come.

JOHN WILKES BOOTH.

His Experiences in Spirit-Life—Mary J. Montgomery, Medium.

I can not tell how long I had been in a kind of stupor in spirit, when I slowly began to awaken, as from a deep sleep, to find that I had passed the change called death. I can not describe my feelings at this moment. For some time I remained in a maze of perplexing thoughts, wondering and fearing; then slowly passed before my wondering gaze, as a panorama, my past life. Most vividly the last three years. Oh! the conflicting emotions that seemed to be crowded in that part of the view. Then I saw the cause of many feelings and acts of mine,—that were no less a mystery to myself while in the body, than to my friends and countrymen. There I saw myself whirled along by the excitement of my own passions, and the influence of spirits who had but recently passed from conflict,—their minds yet full of hatred and revengeful feelings. In this I found a slight palliation for my crime. Will my countrymen see any for me?

When I became fully conscious, and had time to collect my scattered senses, I saw, as a great black cloud, the indignation of the American people hanging over me. Awful, indeed, were my feelings. I felt as though they would crush me. But after contemplating the scene for some time in the most dreadful apprehension, I saw, here and there, a streak of light through the cloud. I found it to be the sympathy of a few charitable minds, who felt a pity for me. This gave me a ray of hope. But I still felt that I must ever bear this great condemnation.

In this state of mind I wandered about, as it were, in a wilderness with none to guide my faltering steps, until I met my guardian, or in other words, became cognizant of her presence, —for I have since learned, that all this time I had not been left alone, but my guardian was not visible through the thick darkness that surrounded me.

I am at a loss to express my feelings at seeing her approach me with extended hand, saying, "Brother, look up, you are not utterly condemned. You may yet be a bright and happy spirit." Who is this, thought I, that calls me brother. Then, I soon recognized a sister, pure and bright, that had left the form many years ago. She said. "Brother, come with me, I have many things to tell you, and much to teach you. But first you have a problem to solve, and you must solve it yourself. I leave you to your task, but will come again."

I was plunged in bewilderment, wondering what the problem was, and how I was to commence the solution of it. My attention was attracted to something that appeared like a great mirror, and which seemed to be hung up in space, with no support whatever. I looked at it, and there saw a great sea, as it was presented to me,—its turbid waters rolling and whirling—as they always were, until they were lost in the distance. While wondering what it meant, and as I was about to look around for some one to explain, I remembered the words of my guardian, and thought, this is the problem. Then I began by my own intuition, to read the symbol presented. The sea I found to be a representation of human life. How like chaos it seemed to me. And what, thought I, in all this turmoil, is there nothing beyond? Then I gave myself up to feelings of doubt, dark forebodings, and wonder.

This scene passed, and the next was a great chain, so long that I could not see either end of it. My gaze was fixed upon one link in the chain, and as I looked, the link began to expand, first lengthwise, then to widen, and in the center I saw the form of a man. As it gradually grew more and more distinct, I began to see my own form and features, until I became fully conscious it was myself. I still preserved the link in the chain. The features grew more hideous, too ugly for human eyes to bear. And yet more ugly still it grew with every pulsation. As I looked at it, disgusted with myself, I remembered the promise that had been made to me that "I yet might be a bright spirit." Then my gaze was turned from that link to the end of the chain that seemed to reach downward. There I saw this same ugliness coming in waves over the chain, chasing each other as it seemed, each wave anxious to do its work in defacing me. I stood on the upper end, bowing over the link which encircled me,—each making me more horridly ugly, until the picture was so appalling, that I thought its ugliness would annihilate me. I can not tell how long this lasted —it seemed an age to me. Then gradually the medley changed, and showed me signs of a reformation and again my gaze were turned upon my own reflection, in the link—understand, I could only look as my eyes were directed,—no volition of my own in the matter. After looking some time, I saw myself as natural as when I first looked into the mirror. Then I became more and more passive, and after awhile began to look even beautiful. Then my eyes were turned to the other end of the chain, and there I saw the cause of the transformation. Here, too, was coming wave after wave, but of a different kind. I can compare it to nothing else than waves of glory. It rolled over me, washing off with every wave, the ugliness, and making its way down the chain out of sight, and chasing those blighting waves before them, leaving the chain in its own true and bad looked like iron, now like burnished gold.

My guardian came, and taking my hand said: "Come with me, I will help you unfold what looks like mystery to you. The sea you fully comprehend. I will help you understand more fully the chain. That represents the human family—every human being, that has or ever will exist. All are thus linked in one great chain, which centers in Divinity; but this Divinity you can not yet comprehend. This chain is unbroken. There never can be one link lost. Every individual constitutes a link, and although they are ever so ugly,—as you saw yourself to be,—still they are necessary to the chain, and must not, can not, be broken out, on account of their ill looks, but must as you have seen, be polished, and remain to preserve the chain unbroken. The waves you saw running along the chain, represent the influence every being has upon every other. As the chain makes a complete circle, commencing and ending in Deity, so the influence must take the entire circuit. It does not stop with the individual's surroundings, but passes them, and every link in the great chain feels it. In your case, the waves you saw that made you so ugly, were the revengeful, wrathful feelings of an outraged republic hurled at you. You had to feel them all at once. Your suffering was terrible; but the law of compensation and of effect following cause, demanded it. The waves you saw coming the other way, were emanations from the great fount of all good,—messengers of mercy sent to relieve you. But they did not stop with you, but flowed on until they had touched every soul that was wronged by your deed, and felt indignant at your act. Had it not been so, those dark waves would have ever kept on flowing and burying you. But those beautiful waves flowed and touched every American heart, and softened it toward you. Had they not, you never could have progressed, for their feelings would have dragged you down continually. You have a duty to perform, ere you can go on very far in progression. Before you can escape from the earth sphere, you must in some way find a channel of communication to the American people, and ask their forgiveness. This, too, is in accordance with the law of compensation. You can not be happy after injuring one of your fellows, until you have in as far as possible, made restitution for the wrong done. Life in its various forms, will be a study for us all for ages to come, before we fully solve the problem. After you have performed the duty assigned you, and have been sufficiently through the fire for your purification, you will make rapid progress in the science of life. Be patient, be hopeful." Now you have liberty to examine your surroundings, and follow the promptings of your own inner self."

I now began to see an innumerable host of spirits all around us,—some dark and almost as ugly as I had been myself, and occasionally one bright and shining like a sunbeam, would flit past, and cast a glance of pity upon me, and appear to beckon me to follow, but I could not fully comprehend their meaning, or in other words, could not bring myself en rapport with them.

I went about for some time, I can not say walked, for it did not seem like walking, neither did I fly, but glided along through space, looking around me, viewing beautiful landscape scenery. Birds were singing, flowers blooming, waters rippling, everything so real that it did not seem to me I had left earthly existence, but was living through a scene of enchantment,—such as I had read of in fairy tales. I saw many spirits coming toward and gathering around me. My guide told me they were disembodied spirits. To me they looked like mortal men. Presently I saw one approaching with a halo of light encircling his brow. As he drew nearer, I recognized the victim of my rash act. Yes, I stood face to face with Abraham Lincoln. As I looked into his face, calm and serene as a summer eve, his look seemed to burn into my very soul. He approached me with extended hand, calling me brother. Said he:

"We both had a mission to fill on earth,—such a part to act upon the stage of life; yours a tragic one, mine a more quiet part. You acted your part well; I mine to the best of my ability. The same hand that carried us through earth-life, still sustains us in spirit-life. You acted out your nature, I acted mine. The same overruling power governing both alike. Let us be friends."

So saying, he grasped my hand, while I trembled with remorse and Painful emotion. Said he:

"Be calm, my brother. I speak the words you wish to hear. I forgive. We were both forced from the earth prematurely; here, our work on earth was not finished. We must yet do that which remained for us to do. I must away to mine. We shall meet again. Good by!"

I saw him depart, a great crowd following him. When he was out of sight, I stood wondering at the ways of—I hardly know what to call it—the destiny that marks out our pathway. My guardian then said:

"Come, I have another scene to show you;" and she led the way until we stood upon the brink of a great fountain, wide and deep. Said she:

"You must freely drink of this fountain. Its waters will fill your soul with peace and good-will toward all men."

As I looked at it, it grew larger and larger, until its expanse was beyond my power of vision, then gradually it faded from view, and all had all disappeared. I wondered when it had gone, and remembered I had not drank a drop of its water. My guardian said:

"Wonder not, this was only a vision or impression. We teach here much by emblem. This fountain is emblematic of Omnipotent Goodness, boundless and unfathomable as you have seen it. Its boundaries are the four corners of the universe. From it the human family drink. From it you must drink large draughts to prepare you for your remaining work on earth. It will free you from every feeling of malice, and make you see mankind as brethren. I see that you do not fully understand me,—I mean that by studying divine goodness and love you will partake of that goodness and love, and thereby be fitted for your work. I have given a brief sketch of my experience in spirit-life, but have given but a faint idea of the extreme sufferings of the first part of my experience after leaving the body, for language fails me in giving anything of a correct idea of it. Can my bitterest enemy wish me to suffer more intensely, or for a longer duration? Is not the American heart ready to grant the boon I crave? and in this way, I ask of them their free and full forgiveness, that I may no longer be held back from the natural inherent birthright of all souls,—progression. I now ask my countrymen, one and all, to forgive the wrong done them. That is all I can do, and when I have done the best I can, am told that I shall be justified. I would repeat, forgive, "Blessed are the merciful for they shall obtain mercy."

Please have this communication published, and oblige your friend and brother.

Fraternally,

JOHN WILKES BOOTH.

THE METHODIST CHURCH AND T. B. TAYLOR.

Letter from L. Granenuck, M. D.

Brother Jones:—Thinking that the many readers of your valuable paper would be interested in hearing the case of Reverend T. B. Taylor, of our city, I have thought of giving it to you and them, in as concise and compact a form as possible.

Most of your readers are already aware that Mr. Taylor has for some time past, been "growing in grace and wisdom," and it has appeared to many of us, that the ecclesiastical harness was getting too tight and uncomfortable for him, and he would, soon demand a new set, or cease to pull for them longer. Mr. Taylor is a leading mind among the men of the Methodist Church, and has held some of the highest positions in its gift, being for some time president of one of its educational institutions for young ladies.

One year ago, he was called to take charge of the Methodist Church of this place. He found it in a weakly condition, but under his management, and through the common sense and eloquence of his discourses, the church grew rapidly in numbers and influence, and became self-sustaining for the first time in its history, while the crowds who thronged the building every Sunday to hear him, have become the talk of the whole country. This was indeed a revival,—one that lasted, and grew larger from week to week, but it soon became evident that all this did not suit some of the more conservative and illiberal of the society. They attacked him bitterly in all manner of ways—threatened to stay away from his preaching; but they were not missed. Then they stopped the pay, but the liberals came to the rescue, and doubled it. Meanwhile, the congregation grew in numbers and respectability, and it was generally difficult to obtain a seat. So there was no other stow for the Orthodox brethren, but to nurse their wrath in secret, and wait for the conference that met at Paola in March.

Thither they went with their sad story, and besought this new "Diet of (the) Worms" to have mercy on them, and remove from their midst this heretic who was turning all the world of Orthodoxy upside down.

A much larger delegation from the church, also went down to the conference, to remonstrate against his removal, and thus there was trouble in the camp of the "chosen people." He was charged with many things; among them one, of announcing from his Methodist pulpit, that a Spiritualist would lecture in the city at a certain time. But they grew ashamed of this charge and withdrew it. Another serious fault, was preaching a course of sermons on the Resurrection, in which he was charged with denying the resurrection of the second coming of Christ, also the resurrection of the body.

(This course of lectures will soon be published, and I would advise all to read it.)

After a very unfair trial, he was expelled from the ministry and the church, as a large majority of his society also believe in a spiritual instead of a physical resurrection,—many of them did not wait to be turned out, but deliberately refused to swallow this dogma, and left the church, as soon as they learned that this must be believed.

When he returned from his trial, it soon became evident, that there was trouble brewing. A consultation of his friends was had, and he announced a lecture for the following Sunday evening in the Olympic Theatre. When the time arrived, the building was packed at an early hour, and full as many went away as could find seats or standing room in this, our largest hall. It was a splendid ovation to the man, and through him to the principle of religious liberty. And when during the course of his lecture he alluded to his deposition, he felt, at least, two inches taller and one inch larger girth, since his ministerial body was wholly consumed by this second "Diet of (the) Worms."

The movement has culminated in forming "the first Independent Society of Ft. Scott," without a creed! but containing the most respectable people in town, including the cream of his old society, and the liberal community generally. He will receive $500 more per annum, than when he worked in harness, and have a very cordial support all around. I have waited thus long before writing you of this movement, preferring to wait and see if it would crystallize into something solid, before we became too sanguine of final and permanent success. But it is now an established and permanent fact. He preaches better than before, and will, of course, succeed.

The Spiritualists have endorsed him and his movement from the beginning, both by word and deed, and have thus been the means of doing much more good than if we had organized a society of our own, and used up our strength in keeping its teachings running. But we have not been idle in our own fields.—Sister Allyn has lectured for us very successful, and to our entire satisfaction, and we have engaged that "Old wheel horse," E. V. Wilson, for June.

The cause of truth and liberty is no where progressing so fast as in the free and boundless West, the glorious West. And we invite all lovers of mental and religious liberty to cast their lot among us, for we have a goodly heritage.

Ft. Scott, Kan.

Extract from a Letter by Mrs. Addie L. Ballou.

(From a private note received from Mrs. Ballou we learn that success has lately accompanied her efforts in the South and West. After speaking of her lectures, in a letter to the Journal, at Louisville, Ky., and Litchfield, Decatur, Clinton, and other places, she speaks as follows in reference to a special despatch that appeared in the Tribune.—Ed. Journal.)

"Apropos of this illy expressed appreciation of this most worthy place and people, I think it but just to correct a statement made by the Chicago Tribune of March 15th, which is false in its reflection on a class of innocent persons—so far as crime intent is concerned—yet whom the Chicago press seems of late to be gloating its spleen over by every accusation, true or false, to the permanent injury and discomfiture of the same. It is this case of Mrs. Worth, whose trial was pending at the time of my stay there:

"Mrs. Julietta Worth, a somewhat notorious Spiritualist, clairvoyant, and female doctor, was arraigned in the Circuit Court of McLean County, to day, on an indictment for abortion and murder. The case is set for trial on the 28th inst."

The facts of the case are, however, as that the said Mrs. Julietta Worth, instead of being a "notorious Spiritualist," was and is a good Methodist, and in full fellowship in the Methodist Church of that city. Nothing wrong in Methodism, though; oh no!

Returning from Bloomington, to this place, spoke again here, on last Sunday—as am to do next week, "Providence permitting," and also the remaining Sundays of April—where my address may be considered accordingly.

During the next week am to deliver a course of five lectures at Clinton, beginning on Monday eve, and continuing consecutively, closing on Friday eve.

In June there will be held our usual Speakers' and Mediums' Meeting, and a Mass Convention—which will be duly noticed and handed in by official authority soon, no doubt.

Illinois offers a field of much promise for our workers, and from my acquaintance with her people, and the spirit of general progress and liberal sentiment, is destined to become a home state.

I like the people, places, prospects, and yes, even the press—the most liberal in the world—far better than a pre-conceived prejudice ever gave me to expect. Remaining over could become a possibility. And am now about ready to yield the palm, that Illinois is in reality to be, if not already, the garden of the west.

ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM.

A MANUAL OF
SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY
By Hudson Tuttle.

WITH PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR. PRICE $2.00; Postage 24c.

This work embodies the results of the author's researches and experience during the past twenty years, and is, without doubt, the most thorough presentation of the subject of Modern Spiritualism before the public.

Dealing, as it does, with a question in which the interest of all mankind is centered, it cannot fail to command universal attention.

While the experience of thousands will repudiate some of the conclusions the author arrives at, they will still be able to obtain much invaluable information from the book. It is a good book to place in the hands of every person who would know more of what it is that is waking the world to new hopes and aspirations, and planting a tree of life beside every man's door.

Discussion Between E. V. Wilson and Rev. Clark Braden.

[Notes taken during a Discussion on the Resolution,—"Resolved, That Modern Spiritualism is worthy of the support and confidence of the people."

E. V. WILSON affirms.—REV. CLARK BRADEN denies.

Mr. Wilson's Opening Speech.

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, we are this evening to discuss the second phase of the subject, modern Spiritualism. Again I find myself on the affirmative, and in affirming the resolution this evening, I feel that I have more room; in fact, a greater field to work in. I shall avoid repeating matter spoken last week as much as possible. The subject under consideration this week, reads as follows:

Resolved: That modern Spiritualism is worthy the support and confidence of the people.

E. V. Wilson affirms. Clark Braden denies.

I explain the meaning of each word of importance in this resolution.

Resolved.—That which has been determined on.

Modern.—That which relates to the present time; the opposite of ancient.

Spiritualism.—The doctrine that all which exists is spirit or soul, a belief in the frequent communication of intelligence from the world of spirits.

Worthy.—Means a thing, man or principle having worth, or merit—entitled to respect.

Support.—Means in this resolution, to uphold by aid or counsel, to maintain, nurture.

Confidence.—Means that in which faith is put—feeling of security.

That the people have accepted modern Spiritualism as worthy of their confidence, is evident, or this discussion would not have come off, or the one last week. We accept the thought that whatever commands the attention of the people, is worthy of their support.

Raps being one of the phases of modern Spiritualism, and intelligent in and of itself, thus endowing the chair, the table, the bell, or Mr. Braden's wooden pipe with a distinct sound, meaning no or yes, independent of the mind of any one in the company, is eminently worthy the attention of the scientist, and of the support of the people. This rule is equally applicable to every phase of physical phenomena known in modern Spiritualism,—sounds, voices and music, whether it be harmonious or inharmonious, whether it be a tongue known or unknown, it is worthy.

Writing.—This phase consists, first, writing when the subject or medium is thoroughly conscious, yet not dictating what he has been, or may be writing.

2d.—Unconscious when writing, using the hand, but not knowing what was being written.

3d.—Mechanical writing with both or one hand, left or right hand, both backward or forward.

4th.—Writing without contact with the hand, and yet requiring the presence of the medium.

5th.—Producing writing on the arm, face or hand—as is frequently done.

6th.—Writing in the room on the wall or paper—furnishing pencil, crayon or chalk themselves.

7th.—Spirit photography or sun printing, crayon or oil paintings, such as are executed by men or women from the humble walks in life—the drudges of life, who know nothing of art or colors—springing from obscurity into notoriety—such men as Slade, Anderson, Starr, and a host of others.

Speaking.—The teacher or speaker, male and female. Such men as Whiting, Emery, Davis, Lyman, French, Kellogg, Howe, Bent, Willis, and many others. Of Sprague, Tappan, Doten, Hardinge, Bullen, Hulett, Scougall, Amedy, Allen, Brigham, Pease, Harlow, Fay, Davis, Colby, Wixonson, and others on the part of our sisters. Men and women of world-wide renown, whose names are spoken in a hundred tongues, and read in every part of the world.

The traitors in our ranks. Let us look at them for a few moments. I mean those men in our midst who have sold their birthright for a mess of pottage. Such men as Ambler, Wadsworth, Finney, Hayden and Loveland. Men that were ciphers in the world before Spiritualism took hold of them, and while under the influences and control of the spirit world won a world-wide reputation, became scholarly and great men. To-day they are ciphers and unknown.

There is another class, however, still more ignoble than these. The thief, M. Queen, whom we spoke of the first evening. Foljambe, the infernal liar; Von Vleck, the bigamist and liar, now in the employ of the Christian churches; men who are a disgrace to civilization. These men, without standing, immoral, and corrupt to the last, were hired by the churches to do dirty work for them. Spiritualism has never been known to hire a renegade minister to lie about the church he left. To the honor and truth of woman, and to the shame of man we bear record that not one single speaker amongst our sisters has ever turned traitor to Spiritualism, and abused us.

There is a peculiar feature connected with the traitors in our ranks, and it is this: those men who have disgraced us most, were once ministers in some Christian church. It is also a fact in the history of the Church, as a rule, that the minister who falls from grace becomes the worst of men.

The healer.—No feature in the world more perfectly commands the confidence of the world, and the support of the people than healing the sick. Among these we name Newton, Bryant, Parsons, Swan, Dake, Grover, and a host of others, whose names will be held sacred when those who malign them are lost in the forgetfulness of the future.

What woman is there in the world that has been a truer sister and healer, among us, than Mrs. Russell Green, of Chicago.

The chemist.—Miss Doten, Mr. Peabody, Mrs. Metzler, Mrs. Briley, Swain, Newcomer, Wilds, as well as others who have given to the world chemical facts.

Mineral mediums.—West, James, Wilbur, and others, have frequently located salt, water, oil, lead, coal, and other mineral properties.

Spirit phrenology, physiology, and physiognomy exhibited by many of our media, culminating in a day the wisdom of the sage and the experience of age.

The inventor.—Such as associated with Kirby and Sherwood reapers, Sharps' rifles, Goodyear's improved vulcanized rubber.

Councilor.—Mediums used by spirits, and employed by such men as Captain Ward Alvin, Adams and others.

Diplomats.—Spirits counseling the Czar, Emperor William, Napoleon the Third, the Queen of England and Abraham Lincoln.

The helpers of God.—Those spirits who are his ministering angels, who are ascending and descending over the electric wave of God's great soul.

All these phases and features are worthy of the support and confidence of the people.

Now we come to the various phases of the law, as found connected with modern Spiritualism.

Mesmerism, or animal magnetism. Supposed to be a correspondence of and with the same law of the loadstone, affecting, however, only animated nature. Mesmerism proper, may be termed the art of inducing an abnormal state of the nervous system; an imponderable property possessed by one person in such quantities as to enable him to precipitate it at will into the system of another person in sufficient quantities as to suspend sight, feeling, voice, sound or individuality. Thus, A. becomes B., and B., for the time being, is dual, and actually dwelling in two bodies at once. This may be termed the Alpha of Spiritualism.

Somnambulism.—A waking to sleep—an abnormal and yet intelligent condition based on A. when in unconscious sleep, A. being mesmerized by unseen agents in nature precipitating into A. (last not known or thought of during his conscious hours—hence, A. for the time being is clearly acting under the influence of the third party. Who [illegible] A.: God, man, spirit or the devil?

[illegible].—The third step up the ladder of im-

[illegible] of the soul, or knowledge of the [illegible] and functions of the human soul, so far as [illegible] known by consciousness.

[illegible].—The fourth step. The principle [illegible] souls of the dead.

[illegible].—One soul struggling with the other for the mastery. This may be considered the fifth step in the infinite ladder.

Clairvoyance.—The inner or spiritual capacity in man to see and understand things not present, and independent of the physical organization. This is the sixth step or round in the ladder.

Thus we complete a ladder of law, up which we go, down which our immortal natures can come; in fact, the ladder seen by Jacob, on which the angels were ascending and descending; we, the people of this world forming the earth end, and the spirits forming the superior or infinite end.

The property used in mesmerism is an imponderable fluid, coarse and gray; in clairvoyance, white and refined. When the subject acts under the former, the phenomena may be controlled by the operator; when the latter fails are in the ascendency, the subject steps at once into an independent condition, and decides in favor of spirit and spirit influence, of which we have many incidents on record.

Mr. Braden's Opening Speech.

1st.—Mr. Braden congratulates himself for bringing his opponent to a sense of his duty, and for the first time he has made a partial definition of what Spiritualism is, and what it declares; and yet his definition is general, and he has dealt in generalities. The declarations made by the convention at Rochester, and which my friend has read us, deal in generalities, and may be subscribed to by the world at large, and I could or might subscribe to much or all they declared. What we want to-night is the light that guides them—the objects—what do you teach? We must have an objective standard. How do you instruct men?

2d.—E very man a law unto himself. Here is an ignoring of an objective standard of truth. Hence every one is a standard unto him or herself. Does my friend mean by this that when a law made by the many does not suit me, I have a right to throw it off and be a law unto myself? Last week we called on our friend for a clear specific teaching, or, in regard to self, as we are—as husband, wife, parents, children; as regards man and woman.

3d.—From the infancy of the human race to the present, mankind has considered certain phenomena as belonging to the spirit world, and of spirits, good and evil. That spirits produced fever, disease of various kinds; that men and women were obsessed. They believed in witchcraft, witchcraft and necromancy, etc. But here comes our skilled and scientific physician, and practically disputes this belief of the ancients, and proves that there are no such influences, conditions of things. Then science steps in, and denies everything supernatural.

4th.—We do not believe that man is the highest ultimate in this life, or the only authority. There is power above man, that rules him. We do not deny the possibility of spirit communication, or their ability to communicate, nor are we unwilling to become a Spiritualist, provided it can be proved that spirits do these things. What we deny is this,—that the phenomena of to-day purporting to be produced by spirits are of the spirits. For many of the things claimed to be spiritual phenomena can be produced by human agency, and are within the ability of men and women. Again, all of these things may be produced by trick, and have been. I can bring scores of men who will do these things, and tell you that they are deceiving you. You must prove these things so clear that there can be no mistaking what is spirit and what is not. There must be no doubt about it—we want to know how to distinguish between the true and the false.

5th.—Mr. Braden says, "I saw Professor R. place a boy in a clairvoyant state, and then go to the rear of the hall, first touching the boy with his hand, the boy being blindfolded, and then, as soon as Professor R. cast his eyes on the reading matter, the boy read it at once. In Upham's Philosophy we read of a servant girl who, when sick, spoke and read Greek or Latin with the fluency of a master. Subsequently it was discovered that years before lived in the family of a clergyman who was in the habit of reading Greek and Latin and this girl had heard him in his readings, and in her delirium repeated him.

6th.—Plato, Socrates, and others possessed this power in a marked degree. Plato sent his pupil to the islands of the sea, and the pupil saw and described certain things, of course not known to the pupil or Plato, for reference to the case of Admiral Boring, and of himself and others, when in a drowning condition, the rapid action of the mind, every act of life comes under review. Boring asks, Might not this principle presented in the drowning man's case be a feature of the judgment. The hashees eater in his ecstacies sees wonderful things. My father, when insane, and in delirium, thirty six miles away from his home, talked with child, saw it buried, all into the life, and told how she was buried. Told this to the daughter of the sheriff during his confinement, and I testify to the facts; for I saw the little girl fall into the fire just as my father described.

Mr. Wilson's replication is as follows:

1st.—We reply, we have in some twenty sharp points defined Spiritualism, its phenomena, its teachings, its phases, even, to meeting its opponents. That the whole world could subscribe with profit to our declaration of principle, we are fully aware of, and that Mr. Braden could be benefitted by accepting them.

Our light, the beacon light of Spiritualism, is immortality—a sure knowledge of a future life, and that we are able in that life to return to the old home, to knock at the door, to sit in a chair in our familiar place, to recognize the dear ones who have left behind, are all objective points, worthy of the support and confidence of the people.

2d.—We teach that charity in this life is the first condition for all into the life, and that wearing this crown of virtue is pre eminently the child of heaven, and the son or daughter of God.

3rd.—We teach that we can not do evil without violating, first, the law of our actual being; second, our spiritual being; third, the laws of society in a generic sense; fourth, the laws of God.

4th.—We teach that death is not to be feared and shunned, but understood. Hence we approach the grave without fear, knowing that in our new walls are not our abiding place, or death our greatest enemy.

5th.—We teach that a proper generation needs no regeneration; but a full understanding of generative laws are beneficial to the rising generation.

6th.—We teach that man is a progressive being here and hereafter, and that reformation is as possible beyond the grave as this side of it.

7th.—We teach that under no circumstances whatever is it right to take life, either by the edict of courts, or otherwise.

8th.—We teach to avoid offense of all kinds; to avoid sin; to observe law and order; to educate man in the nature of man; and that the more we know of man, the more we know of God.

These, Mr. Chairman, are our objective points, that we teach and inculcate. And when any one or more persons go outside of these axiomatic truths, Spiritualism, as a principle, is no more to blame than Catholicism or Methodism for the shortcomings of its members.

2nd.—We reply that in our last answer, we have fully met these propositions of Mr. Braden, save, perhaps, that part referring to the social relations. We do not fully understand what the gentleman means by referring to man as husband, or woman as wife. If, however, he means I have the right to throw off the sacred relation of marriage and the family tie, without just and sufficient reason,—we reply emphatically no. Spiritualism teaches no such thing. As a people, we have had nothing to do with making the loose divorce laws of the West ern states. They were made by legislatures pre-eminently Christian, and not spiritual; enacted to meet the wants of a religious community, and not a spiritual one. The legislators who made these loose divorce laws, legislated against Spiritualism, against its media, and have sought to crush it out. As Spiritualists we do teach that any contract or association of the sexes under the marriage contract, or outside of it, is, first, a violation of physical being; second, a violation of our spiritual nature; third, a violation of the law of God, as defined in and to us.

As Spiritualists, we teach that the unhealthy and constitutionally diseased men and women should not marry; we teach that where men and women are constitutionally incompatible in mind and temper, thus rendering life miserable, engendering in children corresponding conditions; that such are warranted in divorcing each other. Not, however, until each of the contracting parties are fully proved to be incompetent to live together in peace and harmony.

We teach that an unwelcome child in the household is a curse, and all in the household are harmed by its advent into the family circle. We teach that the mother, and the mother only, should determine the law, time, and opportunity for maternity—not the man.

We teach that the man or woman who deserts their child, sins against the child, themselves and God, and are deserving of condemnation. We hold that these are generic truths, and are worthy of the support and confidence of the people—will my friend gainsay them?

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON—Dear Madam: If colored please find your locks and a lock of my hair, for a diagnosis and prescription for myself—age 50 years this month. Disease round the heart—or rather the pain is right where the heart beats. Duration of the disease eight or nine years, this winter.

Yours truly,
HENRY RANDALL.

Winchester, Wis., Feb. 14th, 1871.

Mrs. Robinson, the medium, diagnosed the case and prescribed a remedy, and the following is the report:

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON—Dear Madam; I have used the medicine prescribed by you, according to directions. It has done me more good than all the medicine I have used for eight or nine years. In fact, I've tried almost everything without any benefit whatever until I tried yours. That has removed all pain so far, and, I hope, entirely cured me. May the blessings of heaven attend you in helping suffering humanity. Yours sincerely for truth and progression.

The performance will commence with Rory O'More. Rory O'More, Frank Drew. To conclude with "too much for good nature." Romeo Jaffir Jenkins, Charles Rogers. Saturday night, Benedict or Frank Drew. He is attracting good audiences at the Museum, with his really admirable character personations. It is announced in Milwaukee that Frank E. Aiken will visit that city shortly, for the purpose of making arrangements for a series of performances by his company.

DEARBORN THEATRE.

Manning's Minstrels. The "Century Plant" every night. Crowded houses, shouts of applause. Grand transformation scene. Unequivocal triumph of the wonderful and peerless Richardo.—"Who stole dat banjo?" Great bill of novelties. The "Century Plant," continues to draw to the theatre crammed full, and does not let up at all in interest. Mr. Dunnie being indisposed by a stage accident, he's role in the play is filled by Ricardo, who has made a decided hit. The other features of the bill are unusually attractive this week.

M'VICKER'S THEATRE.

The new musical and protean star, Mr Richard Ralph, in John Brougham's last new Irish-American drama. "The Minstrel Boy, or the Old Home and the New." Mr. Ralph in twelve individual characters, songs, dances, and solos on fifteen different instruments, every evening and Saturday matinee. Next week the popular comedian, Mr. John E. Owens.

HOOLEY'S OPERA HOUSE.

A genuine success. The press unanimous in pronouncing "Cinderilla" a gorgeous banquet of beauty and fun. The house crowded from pit to dome. Have you seen it? "Cinderilla" is drawing good houses, delighting every one with its humorous mélange.

THE

Science of Evil;

OR

FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION.

BY JOEL MOODY.

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL is a book of radical and startling thought. It gives a connected and logical statement of the FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION, and clearly shows that without Evil there can be neither Morals, Science, Knowledge, or Human Action on earth. In fact, without Evil, man could not exist. This work fully solves the PROBLEM, and unveils the MYSTERY of Evil, giving it a scientific meaning, and shows it to be THE LEVER WHICH MOVES THE MORAL AND INTELLECTUAL WORLD.

The book is a large 12 mo., of 242 pages, printed from large, clear type, on fine, heavy paper. Price, $1.75; postage, 20 cents.

. For sale, wholesale and retail, by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 187 & 189 S. Clark St., Chicago.

THE BIBLE IN THE BALANCE,

A Book for the Age and the Times,

and one that should be in the hands of every liberal man and woman in the land.

You want it for your own instruction, that you may be furnished with acknowledged authority to meet the arguments of the theologian, historian, chronologist and scientific man with his own weapons.

It discusses the matter of Bible canons, versions, translations and revisions with ability, citing none but authors in the highest repute, and those that are above criticism.

The book is printed in excellent style, 12 mo., on new type and fine paper, with beautiful illustrations of the mounds and mound-relics of the Mississippi Valley. It is substantially bound in cloth and contains three hundred and twenty pages.

The interest felt in the work is so great that orders were received for nearly the whole of the first edition before it was published, one agent alone having received orders for over three hundred copies.

NEW EDITION—REVISED AND CORRECTED.

THE VOICES

Three Poems.

VOICE OF SUPERSTITION.
VOICE OF NATURE.
VOICE OF A PEBBLE.

By Warren Sumner Barlow.

THIS volume is startling in its originality of purpose, and is destined to make for itself friends among progressive minds than any work that has hitherto appeared.

The voice of Superstition takes the ground that the world, and proves that the Bible is not from the Bible that the God of Moses has been defeated by Satan, from the Garden of Eden to Mount Calvary!

The Voice of Nature presents God in the light of Reason and Philosophy—in His unchangeable and glorious attributes. While others have too often only described, this author has built a beautiful Temple on the ruins of Superstition. Judge Baker, of New York, in his review of this poem, says: "It will unquestionably cause the Author to be classed with Bryant, Longfellow and other gifted Bards of the age."

The Voice of a Pebble delineates the individuality in matter and mind, Scientific Charity and Love.

The book is a repository of original thought, combining noble conceptions of God and man, beautiful and pleasing in style, and is one of those few works that will grow with its years and mature with the centuries. It is already admired by its thousands of readers.

The book is beautifully printed, on heavy, fine paper, bound in beveled boards, in good style; nearly 200 pages. Price $1.25, postage 16 cents. Very liberal discount to the trade. For sale by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 189 South Clark St., Chicago, Ill

New Books.

A BOOK FOR WOMEN;

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

A book by a woman, for women, on the diseases of the sex. The LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, speaking of the book says:

"After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most admirable and excellent that we have ever had in its class. It is written for women; its full of wise counsels and suggestions regarding the very things in which so many people most need assistance. It is a safe book for young people to read, for any body indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to such subjects. There is not a sentence in it that can be perverted or misused, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country."

Harper's Magazine says:

"We wish the chapter 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

"I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

Godey's Lady's Book says:

"This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class we have yet seen."

SECOND EDITION.

A WORK OF GREAT RESEARCH.

ONE RELIGION: MANY CREEDS.

BY ROSS WINANS.

"We object to what the Church demands, an unbounded and unjustifiable confidence in the infallibility of the writings of Moses and the prophets; and the Evangelists and the Apostles. We dissent from the sentimental attachment to an impossible compound of God and man. We protest that Christian theology, as we have it, is not taught by God himself, nor by Christ himself, nor is it consistent with established facts, nor is it comprehensible by our reason. We would show you that Christianity, as taught among us, is no better than other systems taught in other than Christian countries, and in some respects not so good.

The historic part of the Bible, in relation to the creation of the world, has its counterpart also in the several systems of theology here mentioned. They all had their cosmologies based on equally good authority and equally wide of the truth, as that recorded in the Bible. The extent and manner of the creation, no man has ever known, or ever will know, in this life; nor is such knowledge of importance in preparing us for the life to come."—EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

A HERETICAL POEM.

"The Doom of that Fellow 'Seaching After God.' "

By Hereticolus; Given through the Mediumship of Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson.

'Tis the nineteenth century, so they say:
And every one hopes to have his way,
And if he can't get it, by hook or by crook,
He will mend the old laws and alter the book;
Oh, 'tis "quackery" here, and 'tis "quackery" there;
'Tis "quack" that begins and ends the prayer;
Though diplomed Doctors may all disagree,
Till it comes to their bills and their Rule of Three.

Before the people could go to school,
The Knight of the Lancet might bleed the fool,
But now that the people have learned to read,
There are fewer fools for the Doctors to bleed.
And now that the people can cure themselves,
And are running away from the Doctors' shelves,
The Knights of the Scalpel seek school
Must alter the laws and get the rule.
The sleepy cat of the State's best choice
Must be used as a paw for the nuts so nice,—
And so the people must all be taught
How they in the net of the Knight are caught.
The Doctors of Physic and Doctors of Creeds
Will straightway attend to the people's needs,—
And anyone daring to put a pill
In grandma's mouth, to cure her ill,
Must be fined for the crime, with a good round sum,
And wait next time till the Doctor come.
Should grandma dare, with her pitiful heart,
To spread a plaster and cure the smart,
When poor little Willie falls in the fire,
How soon she may fall 'neath the law's dread ire!
For if it's a crime to collect her dues,
When furnishing balm for the sufferer's use,
Does not the crime apply to the act?
Shall the law forbid a merciful fact?

Legally now the people must die—
Legally go to their place on high;
Baby may cry for the catnip tea,
And wriggle to death on the nurse's knee,
For the Doctor, so many miles away,
Will come, perhaps,—if there's any pay!
But as for "healing" as Jesus did,—
Oh! better to close the coffin-lid:—
'Tis "quackery," "heresy," "blasphemy," too—
And the Doctors would have "so little to do!"

But now, with the laws to enforces the pay,
And keep the powerful "healers" away,
They may deal with poisons, to any extent,
And no one can ever fine them a cent!
They may blister and leech, they may whittle and gash,
And for every victim demand the cash.
No crime for dragging a man to death!
No sin in the poison that stops his breath!
If the victim is mangled—deformed for life—
The law does not pity; then pity the strife!
In the "nineteenth century" who would suppose
A law could be passed, with aim to oppose
The act of healing by touch of the hand,—
And this in a "Christian," "Republican," land?

Sure the Puritan stocking is out at the toe;
And the beautiful "Blue Laws" are come to the show.
The Mathers must have a few witches more
To stew into ointment and treat the old sore!
The breaking of Sabbaths in kissing of wives
Will next be the stone where they sharpen their knives;
And paring of nails on the "Lord's Holy Day"
Will come in for a tax in a Puritan way!
A hole in the charter, they think they have found,
And God will just fit it, and make it all sound.
And if the dimensions of "God" you would know,
Walk up like a man to this Puritan show.

"Amend!" says the Doctor;—"Amend!" says the Priest,
"Companions in labor may killing increase!"
"I kill," says the Doctor, "this duty my own,—
You, as a good Priest, will take care of the Throne."
"And you," says the Priest, "leave the brimstone to me;
To the forthcoming profits we thus will agree."
"I'll doctor the Healers," says Hammond, "ha, ha!"
"I'll roast all the witches," says Priest, "with my straw!"
"We'll build God a throne!" says Alliance the Great.
"For this old DECLARATION is reaping our fate!"

The Puritan kettle, where Quakers were stewed,
And witches were drowned by the Puritan brood,
Has rolled to the "City of Brotherly Love;"
And the stew that is cooking leaves "nary" a dove!
But now we protest, when right in the middle
They put Father God, to play their old fiddle!
Promoted to hangman for Mather and Story,
He'll be stuck in the cabboose of Puritan glory;
And the fellow who went in a "Search after God"
Is the next to go down in that Puritan flood.

* Declaration of Independence.

From the New Church Independent.

A Spiritualist Funeral.

The little Swedenborgian Temple, of Laporte, Ind., on a week-day afternoon not long ago, was the scene of a funeral which, to the eyes of the mixed assembly seated there, was no doubt "a curious affair." A young wife, eighteen years of age, the daughter of a Spiritualist, universally beloved for her sweet disposition and beauty of person, had been suddenly called from earth. The circumstances of her death were of a most painful character. In the fearful throes of that apocalyptic season when a young wife becomes a mother, she and her offspring had been transferred to the realm of guardian angels. The bereaved family had telegraphed for a "trance speaker" to conduct the funeral service, and had applied to the trustees of the New Church for the use of their House wherein to perform these last sad rites. The request was unhesitatingly and kindly granted.

It was one of those bland, premature spring days in March, that we heard the solemn bell ringing from the village steeple, announcing the hour of the funeral. Laying aside the bundle of letters waiting to be answered, we leisurely repaired to the Church. Old ladies and widows in black; careworn, cadaverous-looking women, whose faces we never miss at a funeral; jaded mothers, supernaunted fathers walking slowly behind their long gray beards; bright young damsels floating along in pairs, and broods of little girls, were crowding into the edifice. As we passed in, we observed at the door a light-haired young man of nervous, sanguine temperament—the brother of the deceased, waiting the arrival of the procession; and taking our seat, we observed him actively moving through the audience distributing music books to the singers. "How queer," whispered several persons near us—"he's one of the mourners!" Here, indeed, was an innovation upon old customs, both strange and unnatural to the refined sensibilities of a numerous class present,—that class of persons who shrink from improprieties and never dream of suffering martyrdom from religious motive or principle. Though the public exhibition of a prominent part in the conduct of the funeral by this brother was doubtless unnecessary and the incentive banal in error, there was nevertheless a nobility in this moral courage which in the hour of grief prompted him to perform a duty regardless of popular prejudice. We know that beneath that pale, serene face, were emotions deep and tender; and far down beat the bruised and heavy-laden heart with the grief we all feel when our loved ones pass through the mortal screen which hides from us the forms of the angels. Far be it, then, from us to utter one ungenerous thought or unkind criticism on this feature of the funeral.

Soon the coffin was borne in, followed by the stricken family—the father and mother, brothers, sisters and youthful husband. Then a bald headed man, with deep lined feature, large, glaring eyes and prominent nose, ascended the pulpit, and for a little while the house was very still. We thought of the little girl whom we had often seen romping with her playmates—of her ringing laugh, her loving smile, and the voice that was sweet in song; we thought of the maiden, we thought of the lover—of the happy pair we had once espied on a summer evening encircling each other as lovers do, when the forest trees and the birds are their only companions. Ah, how soon the anguish of mortal suffering had broken in upon that dream of love and marriage! How soon her earthly hopes and joys were transferred to the untrammeled and boundless life of the spirit! The eyes that beamed with affection, the lips that responded to love's caress, the cheeks that bloomed at the praise of her own loveliness, and the ringlets of her wavy hair oft rippled by the summer breezes of earth,—all, all were now laid away cold and still in the narrow house of death. But the immortal soul that had invested the material covering with animation and beauty, does it not bloom in a fairer world than this, clothed with all the grace and charm of youth? Conscience, and reason, and ocular demonstration answer Yes—always, Yes!

The speaker arose and uttered a very impressive invocation. There was no chapter from the Bible—no text for a sermon; we wish there had been. After the prayer there came another pause, then a commotion in the audience, when the brother and several little girls ascended the singing gallery, and the childish voices mingled in a hymn or spiritual song to the tune of "Long Ago." After the novel, impressive music from the juvenile choir, the speaker proceeded in a deep solemn voice to address the audience and the afflicted family on the subject of death and immortality, picturing the grandeur and beauty, joys and employments of the "Summer Land" to which this dear sister had been taken. He had just come from the house of mourning—the house that this young wife had brightened with her presence, and while there had seen her spirit-form, arrayed in beautiful garments, leaning lovingly over the shoulder of her young husband, caressing him and wiping away his tears. And there, too, he had seen her babe in the arms of an angel nurse. He knew that some in the audience would smile with incredulity; some would think him impious. But where was the impiety—where was the harm in believing and seeing the spiritual side of our being? Who shall forbid us to speak that which we do know? He was old and ripe in years, standing upon the brink of the River, only waiting for the ferry to bear him over into the fair country beyond. What temptation had he then to speak a deliberate falsehood to this audience? A few very cheering and consoling reflections upon the life of the departed—the last hours of the sister, repeating the words of the song she sang—and the speaker sat down. Again the brother and little girls mingled their voices in the closing hymn. Then came a whispered message to the undertaker—the creaking of screws, a smell of varnish, and an opening of the coffin lid. The speaker arose saying:

"All those who love Julia, will now pass round and look at the casket. She is not here, but risen."

We passed round with the audience and looked upon the white, placid face encircled with a wreath, with closed eyes lying as in sleep.

We left the Church duly impressed with this unusual, and what many would term a sacrilegious, funeral. Although these Spiritualists are, in many instances, drifting about upon a dangerous sea without anchor or compass, having thrown aside the Scriptures as an "Old Book," etc., there is nevertheless, in the acknowledgment of a spiritual world around us filled with sentient beings, a redeeming, humanizing, spiritual ring element which breaks up the old crust of prescriptive, dogmatic theology and makes a rift in the dense, gloomy, forbidden clouds of doubt and despair which have so long hung over the Churches. It is customary—nay it has become the fashion, especially in our own denominations, to speak sneeringly and contemptuously of the Spiritualists. If we are Christians and not pharisees, we shall give them the hand of fellowship, reprove them gently when we see them drifting away from God and the Bible, and try to lead them by the still waters, where life is pure and sacred and there are "Pleasures at His right hand forevermore."

PROPHECY.

What Power can Foretell Future Events?

A little girl came into my office one day and said, "Mr. Stugleman, I saw in a vision last night your foundry blow up," I said it was only a dream, she replied, "no I was not asleep and I saw it very plain, the whole heavens was a cloud of smoke and dust filled with brick-bats and other fragments; and there were two or three killed and several wounded." I was then engaged in the foundry business in Alton, Ill., in connection with Mr. James Patterson, we had a fine establishment having cost about $70,000. This was in 1863. Some few months after I was strangely impulsed early one morning to hasten to the foundry, which I obeyed, and as I opened the gate on going in I discovered all was not right, I ran to the boiler and saw it was red hot and McLaughlin our Engineer in the act of starting the engine. I stopped him instantly, had he started it an explosion would have ensued; he had been in some fuss with our foreman the night before and got to drinking over it, I discharged him and shortly afterwards leased my interest to Jas. Patterson and F. K. Nichols, McLaughlin applied and obtained his old situation. I felt uneasy about it, and told P. that life and property were in eminent danger with such a man at the engine, but he thought the former position was a good warning and retained him. Mac was a Scotchman, and aside from drink, was well enough. Some few months afterwards, I had been to market and passing by the Foundry gate saw Mac about starting the engine, I felt the same pressing sensation come over me that I had felt on the former occasion to run to the boiler, but as he was not in my employ I passed along one square and turned the corner, when I heard a terrific report followed by a shock that caused the earth to tremble. I looked up and saw over the building smoke, dust, and various fragments promiscuously described eight or nine months before by the little girl. On returning I found the side walk by the gate entirely covered over with rubbish where I had passed about five minutes before. McLaughlin and another man was killed, and several badly injured, for fortunately it was early and the hands had not got in, but the destruction of property was heavy. While they were getting Mac and the others out of the ruins I happened to step upon the head of the boiler which had been thrown out some distance and stood upon it some time meditating on the strange and terrible affair. I thought of the vision and how I had once saved it, yet it would come. I will describe the boiler head which I stood upon, for it casts an important figure in this strange affair, many years afterwards. It was 54 inches in diameter, had 48 fire holes, 2½ inches in diameter, with a flange turned up around the outer edge.

Time passed on and in June 1870 I returned to Wayne county, Ind. and on the 13 h of November, following I attended a seance in Lyceum Hall, Richmond, Mr. Maxwell was principal medium and was engaged in describing spirits on the other side from where I was, a strange lady was sitting by me who had not spoken to me nor I to her, although we had been sitting together for over an hour, and while Maxwell was still describing on the other side this lady says to me, "I see a large plate of iron slipped under your feet," not knowing what it meant I let it pass, after awhile she said "I still see that plate of iron under your feet." I then asked her to describe it, she said "it is round and full of holes and is turned up all around the edge, it looks like a big pan full of holes and it is larger than the side of the organ." I got no impression of what it was, after a little Maxwell looked over and said, "I see just behind that gentleman, (pointing to me) a man that seems to have been killed suddenly by an explosion or something of that sort, the left side of his head is torn off and his left shoulder and arm is gone, he is about medium height, rather raw-boned, broad across the shoulders and shows considerable strength, described his eyes and general features and then says he has very peculiar hair it is of whitish color but very peculiar," as soon as he spoke of his hair I recognized it was McLaughlin. Maxwell said, "I see that he had some whisky aboard." Before I confessed a recognition I asked for his nationality "I see that he has come across the water," was the reply. The description was as perfect as could be given by McLaughlin's most intimate friends and would be identified by any one that was ever acquainted with him, I also recognized the plate of iron as the boiler head that I had stood upon the morning of the explosion.

Now these are all facts, and I would be willing to swear to them if I were on my dying bed. Hundreds in Alton, know of the explosion and its terrible consequences; many know how near he came to blowing it up before, and several knew of the foretelling of it by the little girl. I am also willing to swear, and do most positively affirm, that I never gave a description to any living being of McLaughlin, nor of standing on the boiler head, I have not to my knowledge thought of it until it was called up on the 13th of Nov., it had entirely passed from my mind. I have but rarely spoken of the explosion as a circumstance, for I have ever since censured myself for not running to the boiler on the morning of the explosion when I was so strongly impressed to, for I believe I could have saved it again. Now the question arises, who was it that had a hand in this awful affair to me as well as to others, was it Saint, was it Devil?

SPIRIT LIKENESSES.

Letter from J. B. Fayette.

BROTHER JONES:—A portion of my time for the past ten or twelve years has been devoted to spirit painting. Eight years of the above time, I have only painted in the night time, the other portion has been occupied by daily business, by which I have gained a support for my family. I have painted very many portraits, and sent some to every State in the Union—disappointing a few, and making some glad and happy. But to the point. The spirit friends wish me to give to humanity, the evidence obtained in the above time in relation to spirit manifestations. In order to comply with their wishes, I have been looking over my correspondence, and have copied some letters, and will send them to you, and if you think they are worthy of publication in your excellent paper, all right, if not, it will be all right, so far as I am concerned. I do not send them as an advertisement, to solicit or obtain business or notoriety, as I have a business that requires all my time and attention nine or ten months in the year, consequently have no time to devote to painting, except I encroach on the period nature needs for repose. I will mail some copy to-morrow, and thus fulfill in part the wishes of the spirit friends. I find that much of my correspondence is mislaid, lost or destroyed, and if I give the portion of evidence contained in it, I should be compelled to copy from memory, but that would only amount to assertion on my part, but this is ready to mail to you. It copied from the letters now in my possession.

Very Respectfully,

Owego N. Y. J. B. FAYETTE.

DEAR SIR:—Your note and the picture came to hand in due time. Many persons have seen it, and all pronounce it the most artistic spirit painting they have ever seen. All who are acquainted with my family, declare it to have a close family resemblance, and my family recognise the features of a son that was drowned many years ago. If you can do that kind of work with this perfection, I have no doubt you would get an excellent patronage here, and do well. You would be perfectly safe to open up here for that business. You will please write on a piece of paper the conditions requisite to painting the picture, the time occupied in its execution etc., to be kept with the painting.

I am yours truly,

THOMAS RICHMOND.

Chicago, Ill., April, 1865.

MR. FAYETTE—DEAR SIR:—Your letter by mail, and painting by American Express, was duly received. Please accept my most hearty thanks. I not only recognize the features of my spirit mother, but the portrait is correct in every particular,—even to the dress she last wore. This is a remarkable test, as she was never in this country. And this test ought to be known; I therefore enclose a full statement of the same directed to the office of the BANNER OF LIGHT for publication. I shou'd like to get more paintings of spirit friends, but am unable at the present time, but hope you will favor me again when I am able.

Yours Truly,

C. H. FISHBACK.

Ghouls at Work.

About four months ago the body of Lizzie Mavis, one of the class delicately alluded to as one of the demi-monde, was interred in the city cemetery, the matter creating some stir at the time on account of the youth of the girl and other attendant circumstances which were spoken of in the papers at the time. The sensational part of the incidents were dressed in a somewhat exaggerated manner, perhaps, and the matter carried to a little excess. She was buried at great expense by Mollie Hipp, of whose house she was an inmate, and between whom and the deceased there is said to have existed a strong affection, somewhat remarkable between women of their class, who are generally supposed to be void of the ordinary affections which sway the human heart. The matter finally died down and had been forgotten by all except a few of those concerned. There is, however, a sequel to the story, which contains some remarkable features of a somewhat sensational character. We have investigated the matter and are tolerably well assured of the correctness of such facts as we shall present.

A few days after her death and while the circumstances of the case were still fresh in the minds of the public, Mollie Hipp, her friend, it is said, since the days of their childhood, was visited by a dream in which the dead girl spoke to her and told her that her grave had been robbed, and telling her by whom the deed had been done. She mentioned it to several persons, but they looked upon it as the ravings of a distempered fancy. The dream recurred to her several times, until it influenced her to such an extent that she determined to test the matter by having the grave opened. After some trouble she succeeded in getting a permit to do so, and yesterday put her design in execution. When the grave was opened the coffin was found to be empty! A fine plate glass, costing $160 was broken, and nothing was found in the coffin but the shroud and a few of the grave clothes. The screws and other silver trimmings of the coffin had all been taken. It is stated that the girl had a number of rings and jewels of value upon her person, which, of course were not to be found.

Taken as a whole, the case presents some singular phenomena. The story sounds something like the sometime brilliant creation of a reporter's airy imagination, but that foundation and detail are true, is proved by the fact, that there was no motive for the opening of the grave beyond or beside the dream, which was found to be so remarkably true. We are no believers in the supernatural, but frankly confess we are unable to explain the case. We cannot offer a more appropriate observation upon it than that of Lytton Bulwer, in the "Haunted House." This, then, is not the supernatural. What we have hitherto regarded as the supernatural is found to be the natural, and is explainable by some law which we have not yet discovered.

Remarkable Presentiment.

One of the married ladies of Charleston, who embarked in the fated "Home" steamer, in 1837, and who had passed the summer in the north, resided, for several months previous to her departure, with a relative in this city. On several occasions, she related to a number of persons in the family, and to friends who visited her, that she could not account for the remarkable apparitions that almost daily were conjured up before her. Though at work in the chair and awake, she would constantly have her feelings wrought up almost to hysterics by the sight of some dreadful shipwreck, the parting of the vessel into fragments, and the drowning of crowds of people, principally her family and friends, engulfed in the angry billows. It would seem, by the narrations which have been made to us, that, though little dreaming then that she was to come to the awful realization of her imaginings, she foresaw, with prophetic exactness, all the details of that dreadful event, which has drawn forth the sympathy of every American bosom. A few weeks after, the new steamer "Home" began to be talked of; and immediately, as if by some fatal impulse, she persisted with her husband that this should be the vessel she would go home in. The name seemed to possess a charm in itself, that invited those who were preparing to escape our winter for the balmier skies of their south. Her husband had resolved to defer his return to a later period; but it was to no purpose. The lamented wife seemed bent on her first resolution; and thus perished the whole of this interesting family.—New York Mirror.

LITERARY.

Peterson's Lady's Magazine, for May, has arrived, and it is indeed a splendid number. The illustrations are superb, and the fashion plates just the ones required by the ladies. There are many really fine features connected with this magazine.

Wood's Household Magazine.—Most heartily do we welcome the May number of Wood's Household Magazine. We hardly recognized it as it entered our office in its new, spring clothes; but while admiring the color and quantity of its dress, we were delighted to discover that it adorned our old friend. The improvements which have followed thick and fast in this Magazine, show the enterprise and success of its publishers. The heavy paper is a great addition as well as the cover, and its typographical appearance is unsurpassed.

Its contents are unexceptionable, and among its list of contributors are one of the most noted writers of the day. We do not understand how Mr. Wood is able to do so much for so little money—nevertheless we are very glad to acknowledge his achievements. The Magazine is furnished for the small sum of one dollar. Specimen copy free. Address S. S. Wood & Co., Newburg, N. Y.

IS THERE ANY THING IN A DREAM?—A young man named Noble recently visited Nashville Tenn., to meet some friends whom he had not seen for many years. One night while there he awoke from a frightful dream in which he saw his father killed by an assassin. So vivid was the dream that it was some time before the young man could compose himself to sleep again. He did so, however, and the next morning told the family with whom he was stopping of his dream. Of course they said it was very queer; but nothing further was said about the matter. On the 25th, however, a gentlemen brought the intelligence that the father of young Noble had been robbed and murdered on the same Monday night.

GUARDIAN SPIRITS.—The belief that guardian spirits hover around the paths of men, covers a mighty truth; for every beautiful and pure and good thought which the heart holds, is an angel of mercy purifying and guarding the soul.

—Mr Britten sailed from Liverpool on Tuesday last for New York, to prepare a home for Mrs. Hardinge, Mrs. Floyd, and himself, on a snug little estate which he has acquired near to the city of Boston, Mrs. Hardinge and Mrs. Floyd will follow in a few months.

—Mr. D. D. Home has returned from Russia. It is said he is about to be married to a Russian lady of high rank.

ROSICRUCIAN MUSINGS.

By F. B. Dowd.

How refreshing for a traveler to meet with faces glowing with interest and friendship! It is like drinking from a pure spring when weary and thirsty after a long tramp across a heated desert. One looks up at the great rocks, from whose immovable fastnesses the cool water gushes, and thanks the Great Mystery, not only for the water, but for the thirst. Such were my feelings as I struck hands with W. Barr and his kind family, and Joseph Potts and his two medium sons, Wm. and Andy Potts, at Harrisburg, Pennsylvania, in the valley of the Susquehanna. Here—where we can talk with the hoary headed mountain peaks on every side, and listen to whisperings issuing from crystal waters, rushing and sighing in their descent to freedom—from depths unknown; where one could never be lonely with Nature, were it not for the unnatural howling of maddened hosts calling themselves human—I drank in new life, not merely from Nature and friendship; for I had the inexpressible pleasure of witnessing manifestations, to me, confirmations of previous speculative opinions. At a private seance at Brother Potts' the angels came near to me.

A few words in reference to this family. Joseph Potts is an aged man, bald and gray, a widower, living with his two sons, Wm. and "Andy," twin brothers, and Lucinda, his niece, who keeps house. The old gentleman is past work, but is hale and hearty, and heaven seems looking out of his calm, peaceful countenance as he tells of the life they live with the departed. The boys are industrious mechanics, also farmers, but not from choice, for fate has been kind to them, financially. "Cinda," the niece, does the house work. I met this family at a funeral, where a drawling Methodist minister mocked at the living facts with stereotyped sayings and prayers of "earth to earth and dust to dust," etc., hollow, mocking sounds, which fell upon my soul with a dull thud, as falls the earth on a corpse-lid.

Invited to their house, I went the same evening, and met the family, and two other gentlemen. The old gentleman, Joseph Potts, showed me first, the spirit pictures, consisting of large and small allegorical paintings, some of them totally incomprehensible, others simple and plain, but all very finely executed, something like crayon drawings, but which, under a magnifying glass show very fine stippling, the colors seeming to be outside of the paper, like fine grains of sand. These paintings were arranged on the walls of the sitting room, on the second floor, where they hold their family circles. The then took me into a large, airy and spare bed room (where I had the pleasure of sleeping several nights) which he assured me was kept locked all the time, when not in use, solely for the spirit's work shop. Unlocking the door, he cautiously entered the room and at once I also noticed how reverential the old man always appears when he enters this room), and showed me several sheets of white drawing paper lying on the bed. Examining the papers, I found they were simply underneath several smaller pieces, this being probably two yards in length. Not a pencil mark could be discovered, save a half drawn face on one of the small sheets. He assured me that here the spirits made the pictures which I saw below, furnishing their own colors, and doing the work with their own hands, with not a soul in the room. I was careful to examine the papers, for he assured me that they were spirit-manufactured pictures for strangers as tests; that they had previously done so for E. V. Wilson.

Having satisfied myself, we returned, the old gentleman locking the door, and putting the key in his packet, and also locking the door at the foot of the stairs leading up to this room.

We all assembled, six in number, in the sitting room, and I am positively certain that not a soul was in that house, except those sitting in the circle. William played on the organ, or melodeon, while we sat around a small stand in silence. Presently William said—spelling the words slowly, as it reading something—

"We have painted a picture for this stranger, up stairs, which you may go and get presently."

William is a trance medium, sometimes speaking, but oftener reading, as letters are shown him in the air.

Not an hour had elapsed from the visit to the spirit room, when I followed William to the room, and returned with the long sheet of paper, upon the under side of which was painted a beautiful representation of the seven spheres, where I know that not one hour before there was not a single pencil mark.

This picture I have with me, to exhibit at my lectures, illustrating human progress and possibilities.

No one can appreciate this until they have known the noble father and twin brothers who are above suspicion, standing monuments of truthfulness and honesty; doing what they do for no earthly gain, and certainly having no motive to deceive an obscure stranger like myself. Indeed, Andy assured me that he had rather not give these manifestations to those who were unacquainted with him, for it led to suspicions which he had rather not have.

At another time I went from their house to Brother H. Breuneman's, to attend a public circle. Andy and I went together, and as I took my hat and umbrella from the hall I left my gloves, thinking that the night was warm, and I should return. Andy went out before me, for which, the spirit who controls Andy, said he would "palm" me, meaning that as I read character from the palm of the hand, he would present me a hand to read, asking me if I could read it with a white hand as a white. After some merriment about "palming" me, he told me to open the window, and close the hands behind the shutters, which I did, finding my gloves. Then he said there was a communication in one glove for me. We, four or five—searched in vain, and said there was none, but he said we were blind, and at last, a stranger found the communication between the lining of the glove. Now, this only explained the trickery, but I would ask, what motive could he have?

I have met men who have been acquainted with the family from childhood, and who assert that they have known them to be impostors who have spoken of these manifestations, but when questioned as to their character, will admit that they are unimpeachable and unsullied in morals.

Volumes might be written of the strange manifestations in this family, but I look for greater. A few years ago they were sickly, dyspeptic and weak. Joseph assured me that life had become burdensome, and he looked with horror upon an old age which would be only a curse to himself and those around him. Then came the spirits, and by breaking dishes and in other ways, compelled them to listen and obey. They have used no meat, or stimulants, save coffee for some months, for seventeen years, and a healthier, or stronger, or more calm, even tempered family, cannot be found on the globe.

Religion, to them, is a practical life, and at evening, as they gather together in the sitting room to play, and commune with the dead, they forget the rude world outside, and are content in their unpretending, simple ways and life. I could not for once doubt the honesty of the good Joseph as he shook my hand and looked me calmly in the eye when I told him good-by, saying:

"If you ever come this way again, call on us; you are welcome."

Deception does not make men noble and generous. Joseph is often for whole days alone in the house, while the others are at work. I asked him:

"Are you not lonely?"

"No!" said he, "I am never alone."

Ah, what volumes are in that sentence! To people solitude with whispering and singing angels, and to crown old age in its loneliness with immortal wreaths of heavenly rest and comfort, is indeed an unfoldment of the spirit which points the possibilities of human nature, and tells us that age is only burdensome by reason of the dullness of its cold sense, and want of spirituality. If this is demanded, then let us have delusion, inasmuch as it brings health and happiness. If this be imagination, God I give us more of it!

This kind, however, came to them through not obeying the demands of perverted, diseased nature, but by rigid self denial, and other odious teachings taught them by the good of other modes of existence. The demands of Nature are not the commands of God.

THE LAWS OF SPIRIT COMMUNION.

By D. F. Kayner, M. D.

In pursuing this subject, we are investigating man's spiritual nature, and when we have learned of his capabilities and powers, and know approximately, what he has done, and can do as an embodied spirit, we shall then have a basis from which to study to laws by which it is or can be done.

For, as man, physically, is related to all the physical elements of our globe, so is the spiritually related to all the inward forces of spirit working therein, and emanating the spirit elements and forces corresponding thereto, in the world of life beyond.

Well authenticated cases of double appearances furnish us positive evidence that man is a two-fold being.

In a case of this kind, a gentleman in Connecticut had been absent on a voyage at sea, so much longer than he had anticipated, that his family began to think he was lost. His wife learning of a seer, who could solve the mystery and doubt in the case, went to consult him in the matter, and laid the case before him.

He requested her to keep quiet, and he would see what he could learn in the matter. Leaving the house, he went out under a tree, and remained apparently unconscious for nearly two hours; then he recovered consciousness, and slowly returned to the house. Arriving there, he informed the lady that he had seen her husband in Jamaica, and proceeded to narrate the circumstances of the interview; that he had learned from him why he had been detained, what he was doing, when he would start for home, and when he expected to arrive—every detail of which was literally true.

On reaching home, the gentleman told his wife, that on such a day and hour—naming the day and hour, the seer was hunting for her husband. He saw a gentleman who told him his family were anxious for his safety, and wished to know why he had not been home as they expected, and that after he had narrated the facts of his detention and the circumstances that had taken him unexpectedly to the West Indies, before he could question his interlocutor, he was gone. His wife, without telling him why, had taken accompany her to the residence of the seer, when he exclaimed, "That is the man I saw in Jamaica, and talked with about my journey and detention."

The following from Robert Dale Owen's book, authenticated, as it is, by the evidence of a number of reliable witnesses, also demonstrates, in the former case, not only that the spirit can leave its body and return again to it, but that it can manifest itself under favorable circumstances at an indefinite distance, and do what it could do, if the body were in reality present:

Mr. Robert Bruce, originally descended from some branch of the Scottish family of that name, was born in humble circumstances, about the close of the last century, at Torbay, in the south of England, and there bred up to a seafaring life. When about thirty years of age (in the year 1828), he was first mate on board a barque, trading between Liverpool and St. John's, New Brunswick.

On one of her voyages, bound westward, being then some five or six weeks out, and having neared the eastern portion of the Banks of Newfoundland, the captain and mate had been on deck at noon, taking an observation of the sun; after which they both descended to calculate their day's work.

The cabin, a small one, was immediately at the stern of the vessel, and the short stairway, descending to it, ran athwart-ships. Immediately opposite to this stairway, just beyond a small, square landing, was the mate's state-room; and from that landing there were two doors, close to each other, the one opening aft into the cabin, the other fronting the stairway into the state-room. The desk in the state-room was in the forward part of it, close to the door; so that any one sitting at it and looking over his shoulder, could see into the cabin.

The mate, absorbed in his calculation, which did not result as he expected, varying considerably from the dead-reckoning, had not noticed the captain's motions. When he had completed his calculations, he called out, without looking round, "I make our latitude and longitude so and so. Can that be right? How is yours, sir?"

Receiving no reply, he repeated his question, glancing over his shoulder and perceiving, as he thought, the captain busy writing on his slate. Still no answer. Thereupon he rose, and, as he fronted the cabin-door, the figure he had mistaken for the captain raised its head and disclosed to the astonished mate the features of an entire stranger.

Bruce was no coward; but, as he met that fixed gaze looking directly at him in grave silence, and became assured that it was no one whom he had ever seen before, it was too much for him; and, instead of stopping to question the seeming intruder, he rushed upon deck in such evident alarm that it instantly attracted the captain's attention.

"Why, Mr. Bruce," said the latter, "what in the world is the matter with you?"

"The matter, sir? Who is that at your desk?"

"No one that I know of."

"But there is, sir; there's a stranger there."

"A stranger? Why, man, you must be dreaming. You must have been the steward there, or the second mate. Who else would venture down without orders?"

"But, sir, he was sitting in your arm-chair, fronting the door, writing on your slate. Then he looked up full in my face; and it ever I saw a man plainly and distinctly in this world I saw him."

"Him! Whom?"

"Heaven knows, sir; I don't. I saw a man, and a man I had never seen in my life before."

"You must be going crazy, Mr. Bruce. A stranger, and we nearly six weeks out!"

"I know, sir; but then I saw him."

"Go down and see, sir, for some fifteen years, and a healthier, or stronger, or more calm, even tempered family, cannot be found on the globe.

Bruce hesitated. "I never was a believer in ghosts," he said, "but if the truth must be told, sir, I'd rather not face it alone."

"Come, come, man. Go down at once, and don't make a fool of yourself before the crew."

"I hope you've always found me willing to do what's reasonable," Bruce replied, changing color, "but it it's all the same to you, sir, I'd rather we should both go down together."

The captain descended the stairs, and the mate followed him. Nobody in the cabin! They examined the state-rooms. Not a soul could be found.

"Well, Mr. Bruce," said the captain, "did not I tell you you had been dreaming?"

"It's all very well to say so, sir, but if I didn't see that man writing on your slate may I never see my home and family again!"

"Ah! writing on the slate! Then it should be there still." And the captain took it up. "By Heaven!" he exclaimed, "here's something, sure enough! Is that your writing, Mr. Bruce?"

The mate took the slate; and there, in plain, legible characters, stood the words, "Steer to the nor'-west."

"Have you been trifling with me, sir?" added the captain in a stern manner.

"On my word as a man and a sailor, sir," replied Bruce; "I know no more of this matter than you do. I have told you the exact truth."

The captain sat down at his desk, the slate before him, in deep thought. At last, turning the slate over and pushing it toward Bruce, he said, "Write down, "Steer to the nor'-west."

The mate complied; and the captain, after narrowly comparing the two handwritings, said, "Mr. Bruce, go and tell the second mate to come down here."

He came; and at the captain's request, he also wrote the same words: "So did the steward. So in succession, did every man of the crew who could write at all. But not one of the various hands resembled, in any degree, the mysterious writing.

When the crew retired, the captain sat deep in thought. "Could any one have been stowed away?" at last he said. "The ship must be searched; and if I don't find the fellow, he must be a good hand at hide-and-seek. Order up all hands."

Every nook and corner of the vessel, from stem to stern, was thoroughly searched, and that with all the eagerness of excited curiosity, for the report had gone out that a stranger had shown himself on board; but not a living soul beyond the crew and the officers was found.

Returning to the cabin, after their fruitless search, "Mr. Bruce," said the captain, "what the deuce do you make of all this?"

"Can't tell, sir. I saw the man write; you see the writing. There must be something in it."

"Well, it would seem so. We have the wind free, and I have a great mind to keep her away, and see what will come of it."

"I surely would, sir, if I were in your place. It's only a few hours lost, at the worst."

"Well, we'll see." Go off deck and give the course nor'-west. And, Mr. Bruce," he added, as the mate rose to go, "have a look-out aloft, and let it be a hand you can depend on."

His orders were obeyed. About three o'clock the look-out reported an iceberg nearly ahead, and, shortly after, what he thought was a vessel of some kind close to it.

As they approached, the captain's glass disclosed the fact that it was a dismantled ship, apparently frozen to the ice, and with a great many human beings on it. Shortly after they hove to, and sent out the boasts to the relief of the sufferers.

It proved to be a vessel from Quebec, bound to Liverpool, with passengers on board. She had got entangled in the ice, and finally frozen fast, and had passed several weeks in a most critical situation. She was stove, her decks swept—in fact, a mere wreck; all her provisions and almost all her water gone. Her crew and passengers had lost all hops of being saved, and their gratitude for the unexpected rescue was proportionally great.

As one of the men who had been brought away in the third boat that had reached the wreck was ascending the ship's side, the mate, catching a glimpse of his face, started back in consternation. It was the very face he had seen three or four hours before, looking up at him from the captain's desk!

At first he tried to persuade himself it might be fancy; but the more he examined the man, the more sure he became that he was right. Not only the face, but the person and the dress exactly corresponded.

As soon as the exhausted crew and famished passengers were cared for, and the barque on her course again, the mate called the captain aside. "It seems that was not a ghost I saw today, sir; the man's alive."

"What do you mean? Who's alive?"

"Why, sir, one of the passengers we have just saved is the man I saw writing on your slate at noon. I would swear to it in a court of justice."

"Upon my word, Mr. Bruce," replied the captain, "this gets more and more singular. Let us go and see this man."

They found him in conversation with the captain of the rescued ship. They both came forward, and expressed in the warmest terms their gratitude for deliverance from a horrible fate—slow famine, death by exposure and starvation.

The captain replied that he had but done what he was certain they would have done for him under the same circumstances, and asked them both to step down into the cabin. Then, turning to the passenger, he said, "I hope, sir, you will not think I am trifling with you; but I would be much obliged to you if you would write a few words on this slate." And he handed him the slate, with that side up on which the mysterious writing was not.

"I will do anything you ask," replied the passenger; "but what shall I write?"

"A few words are all I want. Suppose you write, "steer to the nor'-west."

The passenger, evidently puzzled to make out the motive for such a request, complied, however, with a smile. The captain took up the slate and examined it closely; then, stepping aside so as to conceal the slate from the passenger, he turned it over, and gave it to him with the other side up.

"You say that is your handwriting?" said he.

"I need not say so," rejoined the other, looking at it, "for you saw me write it."

"And this?" said the captain, turning the slate over.

The man looked first at one writing, then at the other, quite confounded. At last, "What is the meaning of this," said he. "I only wrote one of these. Who wrote the other?"

"That's more than I can tell you, sir. My mate here says you wrote it, sitting at this desk, at noon to day."

The captain of the wreck and the passenger looked at each other, exchanging glances of intelligence and surprise; and the former asked the latter, "Did you dream that you wrote on this slate?"

"No, sir, not that I remember."

"You speak of dreaming," said the captain of the barque. "What was this gentleman about at noon to-day?"

"Captain," rejoined the other (the captain of the wreck), "the whole thing is most mysterious and extraordinary; and I had intended to speak to you about it as soon as we got a little quiet. This gentleman"—pointing to the passenger—"being much exhausted, fell into a heavy sleep or what seemed such some time before noon. After an hour or more, he awoke, and said to me, 'Captain, we shall be relieved this very day.' When I asked him what reason he had for saying so, he replied that he had dreamed that he was on board a barque, and that she was coming to our rescue. He described her appearance and rig, and, to our utter astonishment, when your vessel hove in sight, she corresponded exactly to his description of her. We had not put much faith in what he said; yet still we hoped there might be something in it, for drowning men, you know, will catch at straws. As it has turned out, I cannot doubt that it was all arranged, in some incomprehensible way, by an overruling Providence, so that we might be saved. To Him be all thanks for His goodness to us."

"There is not a doubt," rejoined the captain of the barque, "that the writing on the slate, let it have come there as it may, saved all your lives. I was steering, at the time, considerably south of west, and I altered my course for nor'-west, and had a look-out aloft, to see what would come of it. But you say," he added, turning to the passenger, "that you did not dream of writing on a slate?"

"No, sir. I have no recollection whatever of doing so. I got the impression that the barque I saw in my dream was coming to rescue us; but how that impression came I cannot tell. There is another very strange thing about it," he added. "Everything here on board seems to me quite familiar; yet I am very sure I never was in your vessel before. It is all a puzzle to me. What did your mate see?"

Thereupon Mr. Bruce related to them all the circumstances above detailed. The conclusion they finally arrived at was, that it was a special interposition of Providence to save them from what seemed a hopeless fate.

SPIRITUALISM AND SORCERY.

By Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson.

NUMBER TWO.

"What relation, then, does pure and perfect or undefiled Spiritualism hold to the realm of Sorcery? Let us see."—First Article.

Every object in life has its background. Every scene rests upon supporting shades and effects. Light and darkness are both equally natural, inevitable and productive. The different shades of life fill up the passing hours from noon to midnight, and twilight is the middle page between the two. How completely is the circle filled! How perfectly is the sublime agreement of natural causes there portrayed? How magnificently rolls on to higher courts of being this rounded globe we inhabit—now swept by the full light of its zenith sun—now calmly drinking in the light of countless stars, or veiled in cloud, and storm, and tempest! Each passes on in the same divine ministry; molding, shaping, and tinting the pages of our landscape. Verily, as the inspired bard of olden time hath said: "The light and the darkness are both alike to Thee."

The first lesson which the liberated soul must learn, is that Nature is in perfect balance and harmony with the conditions of life—that darkness has no more agreement with evil than has light—that the effects of both are equally grand—that each are alike the agencies of perfection, and the fruits of both are equally legitimate, and equally necessary to sustain growth and preservation. Partial and even total darkness are as much Nature's supreme potencies as partial or perfect light. Therefore, we must not, in assuming to excuse our own follies, our own hypocrisies, cast the blame upon Nature. "And men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil." How frequently we hear this passage quoted by the timid and time-serving of our own order, to say nothing of the "orthodox" opposition, and how desperately they attempt to bring into disrepute "dark circles," and every form of manifestation requiring the self-same laws of chemical perfection that nature does. For any one to take the position that darkness is the sole empire of imposture and deception, is one of the weakest of all positions, for we affirm, and with an assurance that is daily supported by facts, that the greatest frauds and villainies are those that face the daylight, and with brazen effrontery palm off a counterfeit scrip for the genuine issue. When one may be detected deceiving in dark circles there are hundreds disguised in "sheep's clothing" and broadcloth respectability, plying their tricks of trade, and privateering upon the peaceable and subjective credulity of the people. "It takes a thief to catch a thief" quite as often as it takes an honest man, and many a guilty criminal is to be found on the "state's evidence." All such trickery and artifice lives as much in the light of day as in the darkness of night, therefore the bible illustration does not always apply. It is generally the weak, shallow, and cowardly tricksters who began their trade in darkness, and come to grief thereby, who move, to save themselves from suspicion, are casting discredit on dark circles, and keep alive the question—Is it Spiritualism, or is it Sorcery—or, is Spiritualism anything but Sorcery, alias Diabolism? If they do not ask these questions, they are prolific in arousing and circulating them through skeptical and timid minds. There is likewise a certain class of minds who would rather ruin than fail to rule, and their inordinate ambition to reach the round of complete authority, and lead the masses as other authoritarians have done, makes them blind to the most important revelations.

We think that every analytical mind will perceive at once what is true in the chemistry of material things, is equally true as we follow the chain of causes and effects in the realm of mind. Nothing occurs without a cause, always using the term in its relative sense. And nothing occurs without its conditions. Of course, then, there is no cause without a result. And that result is the legitimate fruit of the cause. Darkness is as legitimate as light. Its growth is as legitimate in a physical sense. The germ, in order to break its confines and push itself out into the light, must have its preparatory life in darkness. The nugget of gold, or even the tiny sands of the shining ore have been for eons held in the crucible of darkness, where Nature, the Great Chemist, finished her work of refinement and brought forth the pure metal. The clear transparency of the diamond has taken all the night of hidden power in which it has been wrapped, before it could be known and prized by man. The whole earth must be veiled in darkness a large portion of time in its daily and yearly revolution.

Now because hundreds and thousands have practiced their evil propensities in darkness, all the year's of this world's history, shall we get up a protest against the "dark circles" of nature? Shall we insist that Deity shall listen to our ridiculous, empty conceit, and bring all these phenomena of the ages out into the broad daylight of our assumed wisdom; Wonderful daylight this! The dense black darkness of ignorance! The pitiable emptiness of words! No logic—no reason! Our argument (?) runs in this style: "Come along, Mr. God—listen, Mrs. Nature,—we have discovered the "imposture;" You have created or instituted the whole thing and now we have prima facie evidence that nine hundred and ninety-nine thousand blacklegs, gamblers, thieves, midnight prowlers, and assassins are in that cabinet of yours—those dens of infamy and crime. They are plotting against the peace and welfare of our struggling heroes and counterfeiters. They are swindlers and murderers. They are pirates and free-booters. And we say, "Away with these dark circles of yours, it's a disgrace to our cause, and we will appoint a Committee in our National and State Conventions to decide the merit of your claims. Let everything be done in the light. You do not need the darkness for your manifestations. There is too much humbug in this. We have ourselves sprung a dark lantern upon your tricks, and now we will raise our voices against you. We will compel you to 'down with those dark circles.'"

Just as sensible, truly, is the above position, as that assumed by our Lovelands, Tinneys and Jamiesons, who have at length tumbled into "the last ditch" in their unfounded propositions against dark circles. Though nine mediums out of ten should be proven as apparent deceivers at some point in their profession, more or less frequent, it would prove nothing whatever against the underlying law or mediumistic principle. The genuine manifestation may be counterfeited in many places of this modern phenomena. Of that there is no doubt. The same is true of a United States' bond or greenback. Does either destroy the value of the original? Not in the least. Do vicious unprincipled persons, practicing their deeds in darkness, destroy the value and potency of that darkness, or affect the order of divine law? Not at all. More anon.

Voices from the People.

MADISON, IND.—A. F. Baker writes.—I have the reading of your excellent weekly paper, which my brother receives, and if he should cease to take it, I will take it in my own name. It is just what we need to circulate, in order to undermine and overthrow the formidable structure of heil-begotten nonsense established by Ecumenical and ecclesiastical councils of days that have so long cramped and dwarfed the human intellect.

BRENHAM, TEXAS.—G. J. Steck writes.—I like the JOURNAL better than any paper I have ever taken.

BONHAM, TEXAS.—A. C. Martin writes.—God bless you, and may you never fail to set down facts that will sink deep into the hearts of the orthodox.

HAVANA, ILL.—Mrs. Phillbrick writes.—The paper, with us, has become a regular member of the family, and an almost indispensable perquisite.

NEPONSET, ILL.—B. C. Holcomb writes.—There are a good many inquirers after our heavenly religion around in this vicinity, and I think if we had E. V. Wilson here a little while, we would have a large harvest.

FALLASBURGH, MICH.—B. Lowitt writes.—I hope you may long live to defend genuine mediums against the attacks of bigots, who, by putting them down, hope to put out the glorious light we are now receiving from the spirit world.

PADUCAH, KY.—J. Newton writes.—Success to the JOURNAL, and your manly efforts, which, I trust, will be attended. The feeble voice of the JOURNAL was heard a few years ago in infant whispers, whose only support was truth planted in a genial soil.

AUBURN, OREGON.—H. Chaney writes.—The JOURNAL is spoken of highly everywhere on this coast, especially on account of its liberality, and broad, comprehensive views. These things are very pleasing to Western people, and there is a reason for it. The great altitude, broad prairies, lofty mountains, pure atmosphere and healthy climate, where man inhales the fresh atmosphere at every inspiration, are well calculated to eliminate his narrow-mindedness, expand his soul, and teach it to "look through Nature up to Nature's God." Go on with your noble work, and if you fail to meet with an earthly reward, depend upon it your trials will purify the spirit so that it will be entitled to take higher rank "over the river."

WALLA WALLA, WASHINGTON TERRITORY.—W. S. Miner writes.—If the JOURNAL were read at every fireside, public opinion would soon manifest so great and desirable a change that the bulls of the Pope, the anathemas from the pulpit, and a sanctimonious clergy, would only be a jest to the rational and reflecting mind.

WEST LIBERTY, OHIO.—J. C. Taylor writes.—I am well pleased with the paper, and endorse the fundamental principles of Spiritualism, and think the day is not far distant when the great majority of the people will see through spiritual eyes.

GALLIPOLIS, OHIO.—Mrs. Alexander writes.—I have taken the JOURNAL since 1866, and each year it becomes more dear and interesting.

LAWRENCEBURG, KANSAS.—D. C. Seymour writes.—Our grand paper comes laden every week with its thousand and one truths of philosophy, reason and spiritual beauty.

TITUSVILLE, PA.—Lyman C. Howe writes.—Mrs. Manley is a writing medium of much promise, and is doing a good work among skeptics and church people. She was a fervent Methodist church member two years ago, and was converted to our golden faith by Pianchette and her own mediumship.

IDA, MICH.—N. DAVIS writes.—I have taken the paper from its commencement, and expect to as long as it is as progressive and independent as it is now. If the "Seer of Poughkeepsie's God" is published in book form, I want six copies.

SWANVILLE, MAINE.—Mary Ford writes.—I regret to make the request of you to stop my paper. I believe my term of subscription for three months is almost expired, and I think it not proper to send it longer, as I cannot endorse the bold and out-spoken truths that I find in its pages. They are food for my soul, and I do not know how I shall live without them; but the doctrine is a new thing in this place, and I fear for such a persecution—you don't know how it rages. My husband is a Baptist minister, and he is very bitter in his denunciations. He says it is the devil's work. I think your paper is rather too strong meat for babes. They must be fed on milk. I have been a Spiritualist for twenty seven years, and am firm as a rock. Lately, myself and two or three others have attended a circle in our place, and it has been attended with good success, and we have been signally blest; having had speakers sent to us when we did not expect them, and our numbers have increased every Sunday. We meet afternoon and evening, and the management of the meetings for some time, but the spirits have sent a brother to my rescue, and I feel some encouraged, still it looks dark and discouraging when I think of the fearful odds that we have to contend against. If my son could only be with me I could shoot and with fire, and my animal nature in subjection to the higher law, I never could endure what is thrown upon me; but God and the angels are with me, and do strengthen me so, as they only can unerringly. I feel quite interested in the discussion, and shall meet with a loss by not having it, but the world will get it, if I do not. We have had one case of obsession, a woman who has been a medium for a great many years. Since we have had our little meetings, the influence has troubled her a good deal.

Remarks:—Poor woman, we will not hesitate to send you the JOURNAL, free, if you can bear the persecutions of a Christian husband and pious neighbors. In regard to the insane woman, we advise you to send to Mrs. A. H. Robinson, whose advertisement you will find in this paper. She treats such cases with universal success, upon the Positive and Negative principles. Her condition is the result of a lack of equilibrium in the vital forces.

OCONTO, WIS.—J. S. Ordway writes.—Please find inclosed three dollars to pay for the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL. I subscribed for it in August, 1870, for three months on trial, which expired on the 23d day of October. As you have continued to send it, I now give you my most hearty thanks to refor, for the family and myself have become very much interested in its teachings and reading matter, and now would hardly know how to do without its visits.

PLEASANTON, KANSAS.—E. B. Wheelock writes.—Mr. Stephen Decker, a prominent business man of Pleasanton, Kansas, and an out-spoken man in the ranks of Spiritualism, has now nearly completed a large hall, which he designs shall be free for all spiritual lecturers and reformers. A notice of its dedication—not to the Lord—but to the progress of human free thought, may be expected to appear, ere long, in the JOURNAL.

CANASTOTA, N. Y.—Levi Van Dusen writes.—Inclosed you will find three dollars, for which, the JOURNAL will please visit me for the next year. I can not dispense with my spiritual food, any more than I can with my temporal food, and I believe you are good and pure and true.

ALLEGAN, MICH.—F. Vandercook writes.—To say that I can not do without the JOURNAL, would only be repeating what thousands have already said.

HENRY, ILL.—E. Wright writes.—We must have the JOURNAL as long as we can pay for it, for it is the best investment that could be made with that amount of money, especial ly to those who dare think for themselves.

ELK GROVE, WIS.—William Brownell writes.—Please find inclosed six dollars for the JOURNAL, for the past and present year. I take three other papers, and the JOURNAL I would be the last to part with.

CLARENCE, MO.—A. O. Durham writes.—We want more lecturers in the field. The masses, in this section, at least, are unacquainted with the principles of the Harmonial Philosophy.

SPIRITUALISM IN LOUISVILLE.

By W. M. Committee.

Louisville is a city of 110,000 inhabitants. It is more centrally situated than any other great city in the country. It has unrivalled, but as yet, almost wholly unused water power. It has rare manufacturing and commercial advantages. It is the great gateway from the North-east to the South and South-west. It exercises a controling influence upon public sentiment in all the Southern States, and it may interest your readers to know the character of this influence, and how far it is being affected by the growth of Spiritualism.

There, are here ninety-three churches of all sorts, and their average Sunday attendance is not fifty thousand, consequently there are about sixty thousand who do not go to church.

Modern Spiritualism was planted here a good many years ago by the labors of Brothers Whiting, Slade, and other earnest and devoted apostles. It grew rapidly for a time, and had its sceptics, its excitables, its hyeums, its lecturers to crowded and enthusiastic audiences, and its wonderful manifestations; but unhappy divisions, brought about by weakness and selfishness of individuals, caused it to wither almost as rapidly as the gourd of Jonah. Its lecturers ceased, its halls were deserted, its lyceums died out, its circles and seances were abandoned, and, at last, the society gave up the ghost, and over its remains orthodox scepticism swelled up, and public sentiment bowed down and did reverence to priestcraft and bigotry.

After a long winter, spring came once more. A few believers in the Spiritual Philosophy met in an obscure hall to see whether a reorganization could be effected. They adopted a platform which recognized the large moral element of religious belief, and they selected officers of highly respectable personal character and clear, good sense. These officers, and their noble lady worthy and judicious successors, have, during the past year, procured the services of these excellent lecturers on Spiritualism, Miss Nettie M. Pease, Mr. Whiting, Mrs. Adelle L. Ballou, Mrs. Wilcoxson and Mr. Cephas B. Lynn. Mr. Lynn is now speaking to crowded house, and gives great satisfaction.

The spiritual society is steadily growing. The number of believers in the Spiritual Philosophy is multiplying among both those who attend churches and those who do not. Five orthodox clergymen have preached against Spiritualism, and nine others are known to be decidedly favorable to our principles. Most of the preachers avoid the subject, being conscious that a denial of the reality of modern spirit manifestations, is likely to beget a doubt of the manifestations that happened in a darker age, eighteen hundred years ago, and which are adduced as proofs of the divine origin of the Christian faith.

Diversity of views as to modes of procedure, and matters of a personal nature, have led some to withdraw from the First Spiritual Society of Louisville, and form what they designate as the First Christian Spiritual Society of Louisville, but there is no diversity of principle, and if the Christian Spiritualists, who do not now probably number a score in their organization, should grow strong, they will hold exactly the same views of the Spiritual Philosophy that the principal society does. They think it most advisable when times are comparatively dull and money scarce, to employ home lecturers, and have in their organization Dr. Rose, Dr. Nicely, Mrs. Fay, Mr. Krider and Mr. Collinsworth, who, I understand, address them.

The First Spiritual Society, of which Mr. E. P. Sparrier is president, and A. Cascaden, secretary, employs the best lecturers without regard to the locality of their residence, and depends upon the subscriptions of members and the voluntary contributions of auditors to raise the funds to pay them, and other expenses. Its policy has been to hold forth a high standard of personal character, and to employ lecturers fully able to cope or be compared with average orthodox divines, and to demand the same freedom and courtesy that is shown to those holding other and so-called evangelical beliefs. The result has been, that there is no place in the United States where orthodoxy so much respects and fears Spiritualism as it does here. Perhaps this is in some degree due to the tone in which Spiritualism has been presented. The fact that Spiritualists are as reputable in private life, as reliable in business, as kindly and benevolent, as truthful and as public-spirited as other people, will not alone account for the respect paid to it here by its opponents. I believe that this proceeds in a good degree from the fraternity and consequent union of Spiritualists, and the consciousness among orthodox sectarians that the advocates of our philosophy are fully able to defend themselves. It may also be in part due to the fact that we have fought our opponents on issues that we select, not those that they choose for us from the indiscreet utterances of men in our ranks. Thus we have not cared to discuss whether there are or are not mistakes or falsehoods in the Bible, but again and again Mr. Whiting, Mrs. Wilcoxson and others have challenged our orthodox clergy to debate the question that their Bible sustains Modern Spiritualism, and the clergy dared not take up the gage thus thrown down. Wise people know that they dare not do so, and Spiritualism grows apace.

We have here a fraternal organization that seems destined to accomplish a great and good work. It is called the Army of Progress, and welcomes all who will co-operate with it. Its purpose is mental improvement, the cultivation of brotherhood and relief upon the simplest and cheapest and most effectual plan in case of sickness or death.

Neither in the Society nor the Army can any creed be a test, nor in either are there disciplinary restrictions of individual liberty.

The plan of this organization is to be submitted to the Decatur Convention, and it is hoped that the result may be a wider co-operation of liberal minds in carrying forward the great work of the world's redemption. Under it the burden of supporting our lecturers and speakers will not fall on the few; our apostles will be better sustained, our organizations be more stable, and our papers attain a wider circulation. Above all these the manifestations, which to many minds are the strongest recommendations of our philosophy, will be multiplied, and mediumship be honored and rewarded, instead of being traduced and vilified, as it is at present.

Letter of Commendation.

BROTHER BROOKS: I received your instructions, and at the first trial went into a full somnambulic condition, saw my spirit friends, and conversed with them. I now see and converse with spirits readily. They tell me the nature of disease and of how long standing. I feel very grateful to you for your instructions. I wish every one to know how easy it is to go into that state, and walk with the loved ones, when you understand the proper conditions.

Yours with great respect,
MOSES E. RUNDER.

Batavia, Ill., Apr. 1st, 1871.

TO JAMES BROOKS, Esq., 306 S. Clark St., Chicago.

The Situation in New Hampshire.

When there is so much that crowds for expression, we must limit ourselves to a few of the main points, only.

We have had another Convention at Lenster, the sixth one; and like all the others, though few in number were there, it was a success.

There was the usual speaking and singing, circles were held and resolutions were passed; but there was nothing particularly new.

Some of the effects of these conventions are as follows:

Spiritual's get acquainted with each other,—circles are held, new mediums developed, new speakers brought out, and our principles and position considered, and to a certain extent settled.

In every place where a convention has been held, there has resulted a revival of Spiritualism; and in every place they want us to have another convention.

We suppose the next convention will be in Sutton, about the first of May or June next. There certainly never was a time in our state when the cause gained as it does now.

On our present light and experience, we will undertake briefly to explain what is the best management of a convention.

We would call it a New Hampshire Spiritualist Free and Independent Convention.

What we mean by free, is, that we would have a meeting as free as possible and have order; and that we would have nothing to do with constitutions or by-laws, membership or anything of the kind whatever.

What we mean by Independent is, that we would have each convention a perfect thing of itself, and without anything whatever to do with any convention before or after it. We would choose officers for a convention, and to serve through one convention, and nothing more. Each convention, would be a thing by itself, and have nothing whatever to do with anything before or after it. To give our reasons for all this, is not necessary; but we put it forth in the light of suggestions only.

We must allude briefly to the political status of our state, just two or three items, and we will term them indications.

Last one year ago, the Republican Candidate in Sutton, (Mr. William H. Marshall) for Representative in the State Legislature, was defeated in the election, because he was, and is, a Spiritualist—was defeated by church members belonging to the party, who would not vote for him for the above named reason. The result was that nobody else could be chosen, and so the town finally voted not to send anybody.

Last fall just after the Concord Convention, at a circle held at Mrs. Sargent's house near the South end of the city, the writer of this article was the first one controlled to speak, much to his own surprise at least. The substance of what he said was prophetic of stirring times for us (Spiritualists) ahead, and that attempts were soon to be made to stop Spiritualism by legislation there, (pointing to the State Capitol Building.)

Chairvoyants present gave the name of the controlling spirit as Abraham Lincoln.

Our opponents cried Humbug, and the cause only gained faster. Misrepresentation and ridicule was next resorted to, until the laugh has been turned on themselves. Next they cried Devil, until now the masses of the people seem determined to investigate for themselves. As a last resort they are determined to crush us out by force. LET THEM TRY IT!

F. CHASE.

The Science of Evil.

"The Science of Evil; or, First Principles of Human Action." Together with three lectures.—"Salvation and Damnation Before Birth prior, the Scientific and Theological Methods of Salvation Compared; Sunday—its History, Uses and Abuses; Prayer—the True and False Methods compared." By Joel Moody. Topeka, Kansas. Crane & Byron, Publishers, 1871. Pp. 350. Price, $1,75

The first book ever published in Kansas. It certainly is most creditable to that state and to the publishers. It would be difficult to find a piece of book work in any city, better performed in binding, paper and type, in which respects, it is a superior volume, and almost a model for older cities to equal. Its contents are entertaining and able to a remarkable degree. We were wholly unprepared to find so close a reasoner and so fine a writer on a theme so difficult. It is clear enough that the East is not the only source of light. We do not mean by this that we accept all the author's positions and conclusions, though the main one is unquestionable to our minds, namely, that evil is not absolute or final, but is limited in extent and duration. A great many novel ideas are started and discussed, which can not fail to stimulate the mind of even the reader who is not prepared to accept them.

The book is a remarkable one, not only in respect to its originality, but its ability of argument and statements, and it is really worth perusal by all who are interested in the great theme discussed. It is to be regretted that the proof-reading was not more thoroughly done.—Chicago New Covenant.

MEDIUMS' DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory, giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. This will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the location of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time, that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a lamentable fact that some mediums so far forget their self respect as to speak evilly of other mediums, not unfrequently even of those who are far their superiors. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Register, so soon as we have evidence conclusive of their indulging in such unkindness.

It should be borne in mind that individuals visiting mediums carry conditions with themselves—so to speak—which aid or destroy the power of spirits to control the medium visited: he or she is but one medium gives satisfaction to certain persons, another better to others—all having their friends, and justly so, too, and all (equally honest and useful in their place.

JESUS OF NAZARETH.

BY

PAUL AND JUDAS.

Through Alexander Smyth, Medium.

This work has been read with intense interest by thousands, and is universally pronounced the most in the whole line of Spiritualistic Literature. It is the only true and reliable history of the remarkable medium called Jesus, ever written. After waiting eighteen hundred years, PAUL and JUDAS, finding the times propitious, and an excellent medium through whom to communicate, have given to the world a book of lasting interest, by taking possession of Mr. Smyth about one hour in every twenty-four nearping all his powers, giving a continued series of well connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and sermons in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was, probably, no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could barely be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed, that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end, and contains 319 closely-printed pages.

WONDERFUL BOOK

Artificial Somnambulism.

The author of the above named book, is a philosopher of large experience and great power.

In this work he treats of the philosophy of mind as demonstrated by practical experiments during the last twenty years. No work has ever been published which so thoroughly demonstrates many popular theories to be unfounded, and fallacious; and at the same time gives a rational theory for phenomena manifested.

DR. FAHNESTOCK is a thorough believer in spirit communion, and teaches in this work the modus operandi, to a demonstration.

The following is the table of contents of this valuable work.

CHAP. I.—HISTORICAL SCRIPT. Mesmer not the discoverer of the state.—His theory of life examination by the French commissioners.—Their conclusions.—The author's remarks.

CHAP. II.—Of the causes which have retarded the progress of the science.

CHAP. III.—Of the conditions necessary for the production of the somnambulic state, with instructions how to enter it, etc.; I.—Of the instructor or "operator." II.—Of the patient. III.—Instructions. IV.—Of the sensations experienced by those who enter this state. V.—Of their awaking.

$3.00 per year; $1.50—6 months, $1,—3mo.

☞ Fifty Cents for Three Months on trial TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or POST-OFFICE MONEY ORDER, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to FIFTEEN CENTS, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3.50 per year.

PAPERS forwarded on the explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No name will be taken on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office, whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it, until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith had paid to Dec. 10th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith J.—10 Dec.—0." The 0 means 1870. If he has only paid to Dec. 10th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—10 Dec.—9, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as 70 for 1870, or 69 for 1869.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL, should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

NUMBER XXXVII.

The First Cause—The Germ of Each Human Being—Matter not Dependent on a God for Existence—Reasonable Conclusions in Reference to a God and Man.

Spirit—In all ages of the world, and in all conditions of society, the inquiry has been made in reference to the existence of a First Cause. The first man, the first planet, the first comet, the first central sun—where are they? There was a time in the history of the world when this earth was regarded as the first world, Adam the first man, and Eve the first woman, but that idea has long since passed away, but the human mind, ever on the alert, is still asking for some ancient landmark that points significantly to the first man, or the First Cause.

Lucretus—Indeed! is there no First Cause? If no First Cause, then everything must necessarily be the result of chance.

Spirit—Matter—whence its origin? That body of yours is a complex organization. It is composed of matter. Matter has eternally existed—it is indestructible. So far, then, as the material of your physical organization is concerned, it has had an eternity of duration. Centuries ago, portions of it may have been flying in the air, moving in the fields in the body of the cow, ox or horse, or, perhaps, hanging in the forests as fruit. There is no fire to the material of which your system is constructed. That which composes your physical organism to-day, years hence may furnish nourishment to the vegetables of the earth. Now,—to the first man,—you desire to know something in reference to him. Please, then, be patient with me. Assuming, then, the material of the body as a starting point, we find it beautifully arranged and admirably adapted for a specific purpose. In this arrangement, we see evidences of design in the adaptation of one part to another, but you are aware that matter and its laws has eternally existed, and connected therewith is a beautiful adaption for certain purposes, and we could straightway infer that there is a design connected therewith. The matter of the body had no beginning—what, then, connected therewith that did have an absolute creation? What part of it has always existed, and what part absolutely created? If God had anything to do with it, was there an absolute creation? Wherein? Did he use existing material? Of course he did. What does that imply? An organization, and God the organizer. What God organizes, he can disorganize, and you are at his mercy. God the organizer, and man the organization? One the creator, man the child? Now look at such an arrangement and weigh it carefully. If, then, man was organized through the instrumentality of a God, he was made out of existing material, and in compliance with existing laws. The material, then, of which man is made, always existed, and that we know can not be annihilated, but we fear our conscious existence may be, if at any time the germ thereof was organized, because the power to organize implies the power to disorganize, and even if this germ was created through a "natural" process, could it not be destroyed through a "natural" process also? We must banish this idea of the absolute creation of human beings, or accept the other extreme, a possibility of their destruction.

Lucretus—You assume, then, that there can be no absolute creation without the power of absolute destruction?

Spirit—I am only reasoning as to the probable results. I rather banish this idea, and establish the fact that the germ of every human being always existed. It is only by that means that his immortality can be fully sustained. If the germ of every human being always existed, the same as matter, his immortality is fully established. The only change is condition that takes place within his nature, is either progressive or retrogressive. The former grandly illuminates his soul, the latter darkens it, and may for a time suspend his consciousness altogether. The first man, like God, can not be found.

Lucretus—The idea that the germ of every human being has always existed, and is co-eternal with matter, places us in curious relations, and does away with the necessity for a God altogether.

Spirit—We can only grasp with existing conditions. You can recognize your own existence, and so far as your own consciousness is concerned, that is within yourself. The first man, if he exists, either had, or had not, a consciousness of who created him. So far as our own existence is concerned, our consciousness tell us nothing in relation to our origin. We are led to believe, however, that the germ of every human being always existed.

Lucretus—You seem determined to dispense with the existence of a God altogether, and seem to think that life itself would be on a more substantial basis without one.

Spirit—If matter was created by a God, it would not be eternal; it would not have eternally existed, and not having existed through all past time, we would have but little hope that it could always endure. Take away all intelligent creative power, so far as man is concerned, and does not his life rest on a more substantial basis? When you know that the germ of his nature is eternal, you take the creation and destruction thereof out of the hands of a God. Even the religious world long since separated God from matter, or do not regard it as a part of him. That rests on a substantial basis, and has no God to fear, for its existence is not dependent on him at all. Does man as an individualized conscious entity, rest on a less secure foundation than matter? We know that matter is eternal,—it does not owe its existence to God,—and can we not claim that man, or the germ thereof, is eternal on the same grounds? Now, God in order to make man, was compelled to use material co-eternal with himself. If he created CONSCIOUSNESS, he could as easily have created matter. If there is one part of man that has not always existed, then there was one part of him that was absolutely created, but the absolute creation of anything is an impossibility—the making something out of nothing is beyond the power of a God. Taking all sides of this question into consideration, we deny the absolute creation of man—regard it as an impossibility—just as much an impossibility as the creation of matter.

Lucretus—Admitting your position to be true, please tell me, to whom is man responsible?

Spirit—Only to himself.

Lucretus—What, only to himself? What a condition this would surely lead to.

Spirit—To whom should man owe allegiance? Do you desire a servant,—some one to pay homage to you?

Lucretus—No; but if a God, he does.

Spirit—Man owes allegiance to that which created him—it cannot be otherwise. He who created him would demand allegiance, but no one has ever requested me to serve him, or become his servant. That conscious germ which has eternally existed, is in a comprehensive sense, free! owes no allegiance to any one, and is bound by no chains. As the child loves and reveres its parent, so do I respect those who are far above me in the scale of existence. You claim that there is a God that has eternally existed, who is omnipresent, omniscient, and possesses all power. Now, I appeal to your reason,—would it not be more consistent to admit that intelligences occupying limited space, and possessing only limited power and wisdom, always existed, instead of one who occupies all space, and possesses infinite power and wisdom?

Lucretus—Please be more explicit.

Spirit—I aim to make my positions plain. I deal in no abstruse terms. I will proceed. The world, or the religious portion of earth's children, entertain the idea that a God, occupying all space, and possessing infinite wisdom and power, exists, and will persecute you for endorsing positions of a contrary nature. They entertain an idea that is not founded on common sense or reason, and will be SHOCKED,—more than when Galileo shocked the world,—if they are told that such a being is an impossibility, but that intelligences occupying limited space, and possessing only limited wisdom and power, might, perhaps, have eternally existed.

Lucretus—Your views are so lucid, and seem so reasonable, that really I am lost with conflicting emotions within myself.

Spirit—The world is ready to acknowledge it as a possibility for a being possessing attributes in an infinite degree to have existed eternally, but regards that man as a vile innovator who would once intimate, the germ of each individualized intelligence had always existed. The being whom they assert has always existed, has never been seen, his presence has never been felt, his voice heard, or his operations observed, while those that I assert have always existed, have been seen, their presence felt, their voice heard and operations observed, and it either have had an eternity of existence, I have more reason to believe that man has, instead of an Infinite God.

Lucretus—Your statements and reasoning seem to bear upon them the semblance of truth. I think your position the more consistent of the two.

Spirit—If God exists, it is independent of any designer,—of any cause. If man, the germ thereof, has eternally existed, it owes its existence to no one—exists independent of a First Cause. It is no more difficult to believe an eternity of duration for an individualized, conscious entity, than for matter.

Lucretus—Admitting your position to be true do you not do away with a supervising intelligence?

Spirit—Not by any means. Individualized intelligences are co-eternal with matter. Matter has its laws, as well as individualized intelligences, but those of the former are subservient to the latter. God, if he exists at all, has an infinite, conscious life, and while cognizant of his own existence, must be conscious of each individualized, intelligent existence, also. Should there not be in such a case a reciprocal action, and we sense his existence as well as he ours? But we know nothing of the existence of any such being. You assert that he is omnipotent, omniscient and omnipresent, and has eternally existed. In our Sesch after God, we have found beings who possess some power, great wisdom, and are present within certain limits,—and the germ of each, we believe, has eternally existed.

Lucretus—If your idea of finite intelligences having eternally existed, be correct, then there can be no Infinite Intelligence incorporated with all things. But are there not laws connected with matter that seem to be imbued with intelligence?

Spirit—In regard to Nature's laws, I have fully explained their characteristics in a preceding communication. Intelligence seems to be the controlling cause. Matter and its laws, in many portions of space, are in a negative state until aroused by the skill of man. The husbandman of earth ploughs his ground, pulverizes the soil, and sows his seed, and thereby certain activities of matter are awakened, and sobn a golden field of wheat is the result. In vast unexplored regions of space, where the footprints of spirits have never been seen or their voice heard, or presence felt, matter and all its activities are in a negative condition,—perfectly dormant, as it were. Now, for any one to suppose that this matter can arouse itself, awaken its dormant energies, and form of its own innate properties a world, he is greatly mistaken. Now, believe me, that as you are compelled, in following your ordinary duties of farming, to arouse to action the energies of matter through certain operations of your own, there was a time that those still higher in the scale of existence, had to arouse the negative laws of matter, in order to produce the earth on which you live.

Lucretus—Then matter and its laws can not form a world, independent of a supervising intelligence?

Spirit—No; its laws are as powerless to produce a world as they are to produce a house, without the supervising intelligence of some one, as I will hereafter more fully explain.

To be continued.

A BAPTISMAL ROW.

A Girl Baptized Against the Protest of Her Father—Two Officers Hold him while the Work is Done.

The rows that occur in the various orthodox churches of our country, come under a great variety of heads, and soon a dictionary, different from all others, will be required, in order that those who lead a pure, upright life, outside of church organizations, may understand the vocabulary employed to represent the various erupt ive conditions of the "Doctors of Souls." We have had "Sacramental Rows," "Sacred Fights," and "Religious Set-to's," but these vulgar terms are but a commencement of those necessarily required, in order to express the wonderful rubber-like qualities of ministerial functionaries who have donned the ecclesiastical robe, accepted their "high" calling, and worship God in accordance with rules laid down by him who sent forth a lying spirit, that King Ahab might be destroyed, and who occasionally so far forgets his exalted position as to "let his anger burn to the lowest hill" (EX. 32: 22), in order thereby to scorch some one who has been cast thither.

Now that we have had "Sacramental Rows," "Sacred Fights," "Pious Quarrels," and "Religious Set-to's," what new term has to be coined in order to express understandingly a serious disturbance that occurred among those high-toned "Doctors of Souls."

Glance at the head of this article, and what meets your eye? Do you see God in it? Perhaps you do—as plainly as you will ever see him in the "Constitution of Uncle Sam," or in the bosom of that eminent divine who never gave away a cent for benevolent purposes, on account of his habit of clenching his hands so tight in prayer, that he could not open them to assist the hungry or needy,—perhaps he is as plainly discernible there as in the heart of that august minister of the gospel, whom Mrs. Partington said had graduated "from the cock and rat pit to that of a circus-rider, then a locust preacher, then a staple minister of the gospel." Well, that makes no difference, as we simply desired to refer to that "Baptismal Row," which occurred on the romantic banks of White River, in the prominent "divorce State" of Indiana, and which has created such excitement that we have no doubt that the orthodox God, sitting on his seven-by-nine throne, somewhere, —where nobody knows, and but few sensible people care, if they can only keep his disturbing qualities from being engrafted in the plastic heart of Uncle Sam, who has no taste for "roses," and who at present is as healthy as one could wish,—looks upon it with a keen eye, and then sprinkles thereon a few drops of the "blood of the Lamb."

This "Baptismal Row" was an event just as important as when Tom King, the prize-fighter, put on his ecclesiastical robe, and entered the "religious prize-ring," to have a "set to" with his Satanic majesty, who made Job boil, God curse, Judas Iscariot shell out, Peter deny, and Herod crucify, and who adopted for a motto, the morning after his creation, "Truth is mighty and will prevail," and from that day to this, like the illustrious Father of his Country, "he never could tell a lie," but the world would rather he had lied a thousand times to Eve, and "kept the thistles and weeds from the country," and thereby prevented any necessity of having the world inflicted with "Doctors of Souls," who carry with them the innocent blood of Jesus, which they administer in doses to suit all grades of crime—some requiring one drop, others a barrel, while that minister who had seven wives would be required to bathe in it for a hundred years. But you may regard this outside of the question that stands forth at the head of this article, and demand us to confine ourself to our subject. We will do so; but preliminary thereto, we desire to state that it would have been much better for the world if the Serpent had not foreshadowed the action of the little George, who with his hatchet in his hand cut down his father's favorite cherry tree, for be it known that he was truthful to Eve,—that's what's the matter! Had he told mother Eve that her eyes would not be opened, and that she would not become as God, knowing good from evil, he would have given expression to what is generally understood as a lie, but the "truth is mighty and must prevail," was as true with the Serpent as with Mark Twain, who, too, cut down his father's cherry tree, and immediately went to him and said, "It was I who did it, I cannot tell a lie, father;" whereupon his father, angry as a wild hyena, said, "Son, I would rather you would tell a thousand lies than to have cut down that tree," and then he gave his son just such a cursing as God did the Serpent for telling the truth to this Eve. The advantage of lying, in a moral point of view, so far as that ancient conglomeration of mystical traditions is concerned, is valuable, for be it known, that these traditions were invented by the india-rubber-like mind of that plastic law-giver Moses, who bottled them, and wrote thereon "Inspiration;" but not like Bourbon whisky or sherry wine, it has gradually lost its efficacy, until now it is considered almost worthless. And now in this enlightened nineteenth century, philosophers have commenced considering the amount of good that would have been realized in agriculture, if the Serpent had told a lie to Eve, and thereby prevented her from eating the fruit of that tree which, like a Chicago belle, was fine to look upon, but like strychnine whisky, would kill at ninety rods. Had he told a lie, Canada thistles would not have pierced our feet when a boy, nor nettles stung us, nor brambles torn our flesh, as we used to hunt blackberries on Chestnut Ridge, in New York.

But our subject was a "Baptismal Row," a new subject just added to the criminal serio-religious calendar or dictionary of the orthodox church, and which originated, as we have said before, in Indiana. This term was derived from Bab, the originator of wooden nutmegs, and "mal," which means evil, and "row," derived from the Abyssinian language, found first as a hieroglyphic in a cave in Africa, and is used now in the criminal calendar as row-dy. The reader who has studied Greek, Latin and the Congo Negro dialect, will see at a glance that we are a linguist more learned than Robert Collier, who is the only man in America who thoroughly understands the nature of Daly, and who is fully conversant with the by-laws of Nature, all of which may be attributed to that wonderful accumulation of matter to the extent of about 200 pounds avoirdupois in his person. Having fully explained the meaning of the term "Baptismal Row," so that those conversant with the ancient languages will recognize the truthfulness of our statement, we now cease our levity, and desire to give a history of this most extraordinary case, though feel half inclined to continue this, like a story in the New York Ledger, but fearing that our readers might consider it as a sell, or as an adroit advertisement for Orton's Tobacco Antidote, we desire to state that Col. Bundy is the sole agent for the sale of that article, and he is constantly receiving certificates of its efficacy. Fearing that our readers will still consider us as playing upon their credulity, we give below an extract from the Muncie (Indiana) Times, of March 21. But before doing so, we desire to quote a couplet from the good old Methodist hymn which says:

"While the lamp holds out to burn,
The vilest sinner may return."

But just a word: this hymn was not sung by Eve after she was driven out of the Garden of Eden!

A BAPTISMAL ROW.

"On Sunday afternoon last, a scene transpired on the banks of White River, in this city, which has caused a large amount of discussion in religious and other circles, and which created an intense excitement while it was being enacted. The facts, as related to us by various persons, are as follows:

"Some weeks ago a daughter of Mr. S. Redman, of this city, while attending services at the Baptist church, became deeply interested in religious questions, and finally expressed a desire to become a member of that church by being baptized in accordance with its usages—that is, by immersion.

"The young lady is in a very delicate state of health, and her father requested her to postpone the rite till a more propitious state of the weather should arrive, he fearing the shock of an immersion in ice cold water would seriously, if not fatally, injure her. She still, however, expressed a desire to have the rite administered, and Rev. J. M. Bennett, pastor of the Baptist church, agreed to receive her into the church, by immersion on last Sabbath. Hearing this, her father took her to the residence of Mr. Bennett, showed him how fragile was her physical condition, and urged him to postpone the ceremony to a more propitious season. He had no other objection, he said, to the immersion of his daughter, but this one—his fears that her health would be permanently injured by it.

"Elder Bennett, however, determined to proceed with the affair, and appointed last Sunday afternoon as the time, and White River, at the foot of High street, as the place. Mr. Rodman then endeavored to prevent his daughter from being present, but in this, he was unsuccessful, and at the hour appointed, Elder Bennett, with a number of his parishioners, male and female, and Miss Rodman, repaired to the banks of White River, and prepared for the administration of the sacred ordinance. Mr. Rodman heard of it, and at once hurried to the spot, and forbade the minister from proceeding any further in the matter. His protests were disregarded, however, and the minister and the young lady stepped into the water. Mr. Redman's protests became more emphatic and determined, and finally Mr. Martin Galliher, one of the church present, ordered Sheriff Swain and City Marshal Robinson to seize and hold him until the ceremony was over, which they did, he continuing his verbal protest, however, in which he was seconded by an elder sister of the penitent.

"Before, however, the ceremony [illegible] Mr. Rodman asked the minister to [illegible] his lawyers could be present, and his r[illegible] the premises determined by t[illegible] cease his opposition if they [illegible] he had no right to control his daughter in the matter. He accordingly sent for Messrs. Kilgore and Gregory, but before they arrived on the scene the ceremony was over.

"As soon as the young lady was baptized, she was put into a carriage and driven rapidly away, and the crowd dispersed.

"The affair created considerable feeling and discussion, and one or two lawsuits will probably grow out of it, as Mr. Rodman says he is determined to know whether the law gives him the right to control his minor children or not. If the affair takes this course, it will make one of the most interesting and important cases ever tried in our State courts."

MEDIUMSHIP OF CHARLES H. READ.

Letter from R. Gasly.

MR. S. S. JONES—Dear Sir: I have not the pleasure of your personal acquaintance. In reference to myself, therefore, I take the liberty to enclose one of my circulars.

Charles H. Read, who in his posters and circulars calls himself "The Mysterious Man," has been with us for the last week. He has given several private and one public "entertainment," charging an admission fee in all. I have not witnessed his manifestations. Those who have seen them (in the dark) tell me they are wonderful. His coat, they tell me, is taken from his person, while it is tied on and held fast by some person taken from the audience, and the party holding him is unable to tell when or how it is removed. Other like mysterious feats are performed.

What do you know of this mysterious man Charles H. Read? For many years I have been a reader of our Spiritual papers, but do not recollect of seeing his name among our mediums. While here he did not publicly claim to be a medium for spirit manifestations, although I am told he did in the private ear of some. Your association with leading Spiritualists, and long connection with the JOURNAL, has given you many opportunities to learn the character of our public mediums. I hear that Mr. Read has been traveling for a long time in his present capacity. What do you know of him as a Spiritualist and a medium? Is he regarded as a reliable medium for spirit manifestations, by the leading Spiritualists of our country? In what light shall I hold him up to the public? I would not knowingly brand a reliable medium as a professional trickster, nor would I foist upon the public a mountebank as a genuine and truthful medium? My aim is to do him justice.

I have made these inquiries for the good of our cause, and with the approval of many of our friends, by whom he was not generally patronized here.

If you should think the subject worthy of your attention, you will please answer by letter, or if you prefer, you may publish this entire, and answer editorially through the JOURNAL. There is among us too much false pretension, and too much credulity. Let us "try the spirits," and the mediums. I expressed a wish to do this before Mr. Read arrived here. But he, or those who took him in charge, did not see fit to give me an opportunity to do so.

Hoping to hear from you soon, I am

Very Respectfully,

R. GASLY.

Coldwater, Mich., Apr. 24th, 1871.

REPLY.

We never saw Mr. Charles Read. We only know of him through the BANNER OF LIGHT, those who have attended his seances, and from letters we have received. Some writers speak of his mediumship in the highest terms of praise, others denounce him as an impostor and as greatly given to highly coloring the truth, so as to, in some cases, render it almost imperceptible.

We are inclined to the opinion that he is one of the best mediums for physical manifestations in the field. We are also inclined to believe that he is a little vain in his boastings. But what of this? Read is true to his own organism, of which he may, perchance, brag, but in its making up, he certainly had no voice.

Read is a medium. Mediums are not made to order; they are developed by an unseen power. If our spirit friends can afford to develop and use them, why should we denounce them for traits of character which are inherent in their natures, and engraved there before they were born?

He may, if he choose, go before the public, announcing simply the phenomena that is manifested through him, and let the witnesses determine the cause, and by so doing he may escape much persecution.

Read never, to our knowledge, denies being a spirit medium. He, like every other medium, has to run the gauntlet of public criticism outside of the simple question of mediumship. In one breath he is accused of being a great boaster, and perhaps truthfully; in the next, he is complained of because he does not boast of being a medium!

We have this advice to give our readers. Whenever you have a chance to do so, go and witness the phenomena manifested through his mediumship. Scrutinize carefully, but with a spirit of kindness, and you will be richly compensated for your time.

We hope to see him in this city soon. Many are anxiously waiting his arrival. Physical manifestations are rapidly on the increase, and are doing more to convert skeptics than all other phases of mediumship combined.

Pythagoras and Plato.

Among the other fine works of spirit artists, to be found in the reception rooms of the RELIGIO PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, are the likenesses of Pythagoras and Plato,—large sized photographs from life-sized drawings by Anderson.

We are indebted to Brother and Sister Albert and Lamila Stegeman for the photographs, and shall be pleased to have our friends call and see them and other works of the fine art, at their convenience.

Hit.

We are now filling all our orders for Dr. Mary E. Walker's book with the above striking title, and can supply the demand without delay hereafter. Price, $1.50; postage, 16 cents.

Spirit Likenesses.

It is a veritable truth that Mr. A. P Willis is located at 136 S. Clark street, (northwest corner of Clark and Madison streets) in a nice picture gallery, where he daily catches the shadow of spirits, with the ordinary camera, by the side or above the likeness of the person who sits for the picture.

Numerous artists have gone through and witnessed everything that is done in taking these likenesses and awarded the verdict of honesty to Mr. Willis. He simply manipulates and follows the ordinary process of taking likenesses, and yet these generally shadowy and imperfect, and yet sometimes very good, likenesses appear. Some are recognized and some are not.

We sat, and after several trials, without anything but our own likeness being visibly, finally had the pleasure of beholding on a plate, by the side of our likeness, that of a young lady, apparently about twenty years of age, with a countenance lively and cheerful. In it we think we recognize a family resemblance, and believe it is the likeness of our beloved daughter Lavinia, who passed to spirit-life twenty-one years ago, at the age of nine weeks. It is a full-length likeness,—the face and one hand being quite distinct, while the form and clothing is shadowy and indistinct.

Mr. Willis has left his gallery in Crawfordsville, Ind., and come to this city for the special purpose of giving those who desire it an opportunity to secure spirit likenesses. He will remain here a few weeks and then return home to his own gallery.

Our friends in this section of the country will do well to call upon him at an early day if they desire to test his mediumship in spirit photography.

Inquiry.

S. S. JONES—Dear Sir:—Pardon me, I wish to ask a question. Is it possible for any one to become a medium,—and how? Have you any works that would enlighten me. Please answer with a few words in the JOURNAL.

Very truly yours,
S. W. CHARLES

Wernersville, Pa., April 24th, 1871.

REPLY.—All people are more or less mediumistic. As the faculty of the mind is developed in music or mathematics, by subjecting the scholar to the well-known rules of those branches of study, so mediumistic powers,—latent to some extent in every person,—are brought out by an observance of certain well-known rules of development.

These rules are very fully set forth in "Undercliff on Mesmerism," and "Fahnestock's Artificial Somnambulism."

These two volumes contain a great amount of useful information in forming circles, and in developing mediums. See book catalogue in this paper. We will send both on receipt of three dollars, free of postage.

Letter from S. S. Rembert.

S. S. JONES—Dear Sir:—Will you have the kindness to give us, if convenient, a full, specific, and satisfactory authentication of the very interesting phenomena of the Bangs children, according to the statement of their mother, published some weeks since in the JOURNAL, and oblige.

Very respectfully,
S. S. REMBERT.

Memphis, Tenn., April 20, 1871.

REPLY.—The Bangs children are now in this city, and hold seances for the benefit of investigators. To such seances, we refer all who would receive full, specific, and satisfactory authentication of the phenomena referred to.

The Bangs family stand above reproach among their peers, who are first class citizens of this city.

Our report was full—what more would our correspondent have but actual observation.

Spirit communion by those who seek it, is an every day occurrence in this city, through a great number of phases of mediumship. Physical mediums are rapidly increasing, and the spirit manifestations through them, is most positive evidence of the immortality of the soul, and its power to communicate with mortals.

Thomas Gales Forster.

At his request, our well beloved brother, Thomas Gales Forster, was, on the 21st of April, constituted a "Regular Minister of the Gospel" in legal form, by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, and authorized to solemnize marriages anywhere in the United States and Territories.

Those who may be about to enter into a matrimonial alliance, will find Bro. Forster a very competent servant of the law, in tying knots not easily untied—except in Chicago!

The "Hollow Globe."

This very remarkable book, about which considerable has been said in these columns, is now ready for delivery. It is a well gotten up work of about four hundred and fifty pages. Price, $2.50; postage, 24 cents. For sale at this office.

The price may seem high to some, but we believe that every purchaser who shall give the work a careful reading, will consider that they have got value received for their money. Orders for nearly the whole of the first edition have already been received.

Hindoo New Testament.

Fine progress is being made on the BHAGVAT-GEETA. It will be ready for delivery in about three weeks. Send in your orders, friends. It should go into the hands of every reader.

The first limited edition was bound in paper, and sold in England, to the few who dared to have it in their houses, at four pounds sterling. We now propose to bind it neatly in muslin, and sell it for one dollar and twenty-five cents per copy; postage, 16 cents. Send in the orders—first orders first filled.

Personal and Local.

—J. R. Francis will lecture at Crosby's Music Hall, Chicago, during the month of May, Sunday evenings only.

—B. F. Cushman, Troy, N. Y., desires to correspond with Harry Bastian in regard to his stopping and giving seances at that city. Will Harry write him, and oblige. Harry's address is now North Boston, Erie County, N. Y.

—Mrs. Jorgenson, who was arrested by the civil authorities on account of exercising her mediumistic gifts, is still at her parlors, rooms 28 and 29 Honore Block, Chicago. She is really a most excellent symbolic seer and inspirational adviser, and all who give her a visit will not fail to be well satisfied. Her persecutions will result, we hope, in the increase of her patronage.

—Dr. D. P. Kayner is now a resident of this state. He is an able lecturer, and a first class clairvoyant physician. The Observer, a paper published at his old home, Erie, Pa., thus speaks of him: "Dr. D. P. Kayner will soon leave for his new residence, St. Charles, Ill., where he intends to practice as a clairvoyant physician. The doctor is a gentleman of decided ability, and has enjoyed a large practice in our city. He will be accompanied by many good wishes."

—We are happy to see an increasing demand for the works of our gifted co-worker, Hudson Tuttle.

—Brother Pelley writes to us that the twenty-third anniversary of modern Spiritualism was duly celebrated at Colburn, Ind. Mrs. Beck, a trance speaker, delivered an address appropriate for the occasion.

—Our friends will find the Spurrier House a pleasant place to stop at, in Louisville, Ky. See advertisement.

—The JOURNAL has now nearly fifty subscribers at Keokuk, Iowa. Thanks to the friends there for the interest they have manifested in our belief.

—Harry Bastian, the medium for physical manifestations, is now East, and his post office address is North Boston, Erie County, N. Y. He is an excellent medium,—one of the very best, and we hope he will receive a cordial greeting among the friends at the East.

—Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson is now lecturing at Terre Haute, Ind. She is one of our most efficient laborers in the field of reform.

—There are over forty women connected with the New York press.

—"Health by Good Living" has reached a sale of nearly 20,000 copies.

—Dr. E. E. Perkins is now at Kansas City, and will answer calls to lecture.

—Dr. H. P. Fairfield will speak in Wilmington, Delaware, Sunday, April 30th; in Putnam, Conn., during May, and will make other engagements. Address, Ancora, N. J.

—For spirit artists, Brother Beach, we would refer you to advertisements in this paper.

—Miss Mary E. Currier, the musical medium, has closed her public seances for the present.

—J. Madison Allen is actively engaged in the lecturer's field. He is a trance speaker, yet always conscious. His lectures on Spiritualism are usually given by a spirit or band of spirits, separate and distinct from himself. Sometimes his own consciousness is swallowed up in that of the controlling mind, and he forgets all about himself, and seems to be at the time the spirit who is controlling him. He is sometimes acutely conscious of being some distance above his body, enjoying a delightful interview with certain persons who had been dear friends before their "chrysemutation," and while talking with them, he could look back and behold his body, and moving earth ills, and even hear the words that were being uttered by some body through them. This is, of course, very pleasant, and somewhat novel to him. He sees spirits and spiritual things, every day of his life. Mr. Allen is really a first-class speaker, and far superior to those flashy inspirational lecturers who look with such contempt upon the trance and "shut eyed" mediums. He should find constant employment, for his lectures are always entertaining and instructive. His address is Ancora, N. Y., or care of BANNER OF LIGHT.

—All our lady readers are interested in "A Woman's Secret," a story of great merit and power for good, written by a prominent Chicago lady.

—Mrs. M. S. Hoadley has been drawing large audiences at Lynn, Mass.

—Mrs. F. A. Logan is in Wisconsin. She attended the convention at Waukesha. She will extend the field of her labors along the line of the Milwaukee and St. Paul R. R., and will answer calls to lecture in Wisconsin during the summer months. Address her at Genesee, Wisconsin.

—Mrs. Clara A. Field will spend the summer in Maine.

—Have you read "The Mental Cure?"

—Bishop Doane, of Albany, has prepared a special form of prayer for rain, to be used by the Episcopal churches of his diocese. The prayer book has a form to be used on the occasion of summer drought, but none for a drought occurring in winter.

—Dr. Harris, of Mason City, Ill., writes: "Mrs. Bell A. Chamberlain did not give us the cold shoulder I supposed she had, for the same day I wrote to you about her, I got her letter saying that she was coming, and she has puzzled the wise ones, here as well as elsewhere."

—"One Religion, Many Creeds," is a valuable book that deserves the attention of all liberal people. It is put up in splendid style, and sells for less than first cost.

—J. Q. Brinks thinks that a good test medium would do well at Graham, Mo.

—Brother Nathan B. Laird writes to us giving an account of how he saw the spirit forming over the dead body of his son.

—"The Future Life," by Mrs. Sweet, has a constant call from hungry souls. Like its author, it is full of sweet thought.

—Alonzo Fairchild, of Schenectady, N. Y., is a healing medium.

—The house of Brother Gaffery, of Salem, Ind., is open to all good lecturers and mediums.

—Davis' "Fountain" still flows from our shelves in undiminished volume.

—John Roberts, of New Boston, writes to us speaking flatteringly of the lectures of Mrs. S. E. Warner. The Spiritualists there propose to build a hall soon.

—"Jesus of Nazareth," by Alexander Smyth, is still in great demand. A new edition will soon have to be published.

—Crosby's Music Hall has been engaged by the Spiritualists for another year.

Narrative of a Dark Spirit.

NUMBER SIX.

By Rev. John Pierpont.

It has been very properly asked by those who have read this narrative, whether it was a just punishment to keep an individual so long as this one has been, suffering for crimes, the tendencies to which were, in the main, inherited. I would say in regard to this, that accountability is of various kinds or grades.

In reviewing my own life, I am glad that in my early days I studied law—not only human law, but the principles of government. The study of law in its broadest aspect, contemplates a knowledge of the principles which govern matter in the visible universe and mind in its broad realm.

On my entrance in this life, I found that the results of these early, and to me, laborious studies, gave me great advantage. I was enabled to comprehend many principles, much more readily than I might otherwise have done.

Although laws and regulations similar to those on earth, are confined mainly to the lower spheres and conditions of this life, still the knowledge of these is of value to us.

Our study of law comprehends, first, the grand principles which relate to the government of matter in its various forms of unfoldment, and the spiritual forces which are operating in this domain; next the higher and more spiritual forces which are operating in and through mind, and producing the varied expressions of principles, as the former do of matter. For, matter is the outworking of spiritual-material forces, and divine principles are the outworking of the higher spiritual forces. In the study of the latter, the great question of human accountability comes up.

I desire to present some thoughts upon this, and to illustrate them to you by the conditions of this brother, for whom you have manifested so much interest.

We may consider human accountability or responsibility under three heads—leaving out a condition in which the individual is independent of all responsibility. We have, first, the state in which an individual is only responsible to a very limited extent for conditions which others have thrown around him.

Second, That state in which he is responsible for the conditions he has brought around and within himself, but not consciously so of the acts that he is performing.

Third, That state in which he is responsible for every act.

The first state of irresponsibility is confined to idiocy, certain forms of insanity, and to early childhood.

We should not refer to this, but for the fact that persons may pass out of it into one of the other conditions. We can not say of a child born either in the best or worst conditions of earth, that it is in any way responsible for these. Its knowledge is so limited that it does not amount to any thing definite, and it is entirely subject to conditions.

So of our friend Antonio; I can see now clearly what were the first conditions which surrounded him on his entrance into earth-life, and I have no appreciation of any thing lower or more to be dreaded, and while it may seem to be a very long time since that period, we must remember that his parents, and especially his father, are still groping in darkness amid the most revolting conditions; and it will be a part of Antonio's mission to bring them out of these, when he has reached a certain plane of development.

I would refer the student of this philosophy to the able lecture of my friend Hurd, given through our mutual friend, that excellent medium, Mrs. Yeaw, and published by you in the JOURNAL.

Antonio came in the second condition to which I have referred, about the time that he refers to the labors of the good Sisters of Mercy. He was not responsible for acts then, nor for conditions, until he began to create them himself, and only partially so then, as they were but extensions of those which he had inherited. Hence the difficulties with which these good women had to contend, in endeavoring to impress upon his mind the terrible nature of his acts, and to awaken some feeling of responsibility for them.

I have seen and conversed with these sisters, and they confirm his statements, and are among those who are seeking to aid him. We realize now that it was indeed a very feeble spark of responsibility, even for his actions, that they could impress upon him in his low condition, for in all cases it is not until there can be some compunction or suffering for wrong that there can be any progression.

I have traced his life through all its course on earth, and have never found an individual in whom there was so little responsibility awakened for acts done, and this accounts for the long period that he has been compelled to remain in the shades of outer as well as inner darkness.

During his entire life on earth, a very small per centage of his acts were of a character for which he was responsible, or for which he felt any compunction. For the inherited conditions a spirit is never responsible, the irresponsibility for these can only be removed by slow degrees of growth, which must be aided by those who have transmitted them to the individual, and the father whom I have seen is not yet in a condition to do any thing to remove these chains which he placed upon this child, by his low and degrading passions. The mother, whom I have also seen, has done more for him; she was not so deeply immersed in crime, and it is through her influence, aided by others, that he has been enabled to overcome what he has of these conditions. Let me present this fact as strongly as I can. The responsibility for conditions must always rest upon those who produce them. This is a fearful lesson for humanity, but one that all should fully realize.

The third state, that of responsibility for actions, is the highest condition of life with you or us. It may be compared to the cash system, while the other is like the credit system which so often leads to bankruptcy.

Those who are in conditions for which they are not responsible, suffer more negatively than positively—more by being deprived of enjoyment than from any real pain. Those who produce low conditions, either for themselves or others, may become so callous and indifferent, as not to be conscious of much suffering at the time, while those who are the most conscious of the nature of their acts are the most responsible, and will receive pleasure of pain, happiness or suffering, according to the acts.

The way out of the first condition is mainly through the mediation of others and the labors of those who have produced them.

Out of the second condition, one can only come through suffering on their own part, as they have produced these conditions. It is by awakening to a consciousness of the nature of single acts, and feeling the responsibility thereof, that an escape is made from these conditions. They who are indifferent, who are neither hot nor cold, are in the worst condition, and can only escape from it through deep suffering.

The reason why sensitive persons must suffer as you did, when coming in contact with such spirits, is that in order that they may be brought to a consciousness of their acts, some one must be brought into sympathy with them before they can experience a change, or realize that they are doing wrong. The saviors of mankind in all ages, have been baptized into suffering in all ages of the world, with those whom they were to help. This sympathetic suffering for wrong, often causes intense pain, physically and mentally.

We may classify sufferings as follows:

First, That which is purely sympathetic.

Second, That which is caused in individuals from consciousness of wrong acts by themselves.

Third, That which is the result of wrong conditions produced by themselves.

Fourth, The sufferings resulting from conditions produced by others, which, as we have said, is negative in its character.

All these forms of suffering are curative. They are growth pains, and must be endured in the progress of the soul from lower to higher conditions. All human beings must pass through some of these experiences, and spirits in all spheres, to which I have had access, find their happiness and progression promoted, at times by a willingness to visit those who are lower in the scale of life, and take on conditions of suffering, while they know they can relieve others from. Thus is continued the beautiful work of being saviors one of another.

So, through all our experience we find conditions advancing very often, however, by repeating under more favorable circumstances the labors of those conditions through which we have passed. Like the frequent ablutions of the body, the soul needs these purifications, these real baptisms, that it may grow more pure and stainless, as I remarked in one of the lectures given by Mrs. Yeaw to your people.

If you would have a true and proper appreciation of human life, you must not look upon it in fragments. If you go into the studio of an artist, and select one of the finest and most beautiful pictures that his genius and skill have produced, and cut that picture up into thousands of little pieces; if you take up any one of these, there will be no similitude or beauty in it.

You must have them all together, just as the soul of the artist had arranged them, and then you will find that each one was essential in order that you might realize the true grandeur and beauty of the picture.

So of human life, not the earth-life alone is sufficient to give you a realizing sense of the grand picture that the divine artist is painting.

You must stand out in the great gallery of the Infinite, and looking along the vast corridors of life, see the panorama unstretched before you in the distance, with all its grouping, its lights and shadows shall be seen; then will you realize something of its beauty, its sublimity, its true grandeur.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

PARTNER WANTED.

THE Subscriber is engaged as Superintendent of a Stock Company for the Manufacture of a Large Line of New and Popular Patent Medicines, and is desirous of reducing it to a Partnership Company, with a view of locating the business in Chicago.

The Remedies have thus far attained an unparalleled popularity, and are destined to exceed anything in the history of Patent Medicine enterprises. Each preparation is made with a view of meeting the demands of this progressive age, and will live and grow popular when the present system of poisonous drug medication shall have passed away. The stock is held principally by men of limited means, who are unable to bear the expense of the anticipated change of location, hence a large share of the stock can be purchased for less than half its real value. Full particulars, together with supplies of all our printed matter, will be sent on application.

Correspondence solicited. Address:

MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD,

Healing Medium,

Has been before the public as a successful Healer the past fifteen years. We rely entirely on the controlling influences. We diagnose and give prescriptions by letter. Distance no objection. Will visit in person's reasonable distance those that desire, and can afford the expense. Delineation and advice in a variety of ways. Emblems we give gratuitously to all our patients, when presented by our guides. Our former custom has been to come en rapport with the applicant by the hand writing or lock of hair; but to save time, and the unpleasant sensation of taking on the symptoms of the disease, we require the applicant to give age and sex, with one or two leading symptoms of the disease, written by the patient, if able to write—if not, send lock of hair. As the giving of tests is not the object which we seek, but to restore the patient to health by Nature's own hand, to the shortest time possible; we do not deem it necessary here to lumber up an advertisement with what we have done or what we can do, but prefer to be known by our fruits.

Terms, for diagnosis and prescription, $2; Diagnosis without prescription, $1; all subsequent prescriptions, $1 each. All letters should be accompanied with the fee, and addressed to MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD, Box 45, Lake Mills, Jefferson Co., Wis.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium,

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

MRS. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

MRS. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well when the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $2.00; each subsequent, $1.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $3; answering Business Letters, $3. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

THE CLOUD OF WITNESSES.

A Lecture by Mrs. Juliette Yeaw, of Northampton, Mass., Delivered at Harmonial Hall, Philadelphia, March 26th, 1871.

Reported for the Religio-Philosophical Journal, by Henry T. Child, M. D.

INVOCATION.

Out into the illimitable realms of Infinite and Perfect Love, our soul's aspirations reach this morning. We feel that in weakness, the Great Power of Life is our strength; that in every trial and emergency of life, Infinite and Eternal Love is sufficient to meet and answer the wants of the soul. We rejoice to know that the Spirit of Life hath never in any age been without a witness; but most of all do we rejoice, that to-day, many are the witnesses of the truth of immortality; that these witnesses are not in a few localities only, but in many. We rejoice in that oneness of purpose that hath drawn these souls together this morning with desires to know what is truth; that wherever it does knock at the portals of truth, angel-hands shall throw wide open these portals. O! may all who have assembled here,—spirits and mortals,—realize their different conditions of life, and that they are members of the human family; that each and all are in dissolubly connected; that there are natural relations and dependencies that unite all, and, so realizing that grand and glorious truth, may they also realize that every act of their lives will affect the life of every child of the Infinite Father; then may they realize the relations that bind them to the great heart of humanity, to the soul of Infinite love. We know that not one of them hath been exempt from the discipline of sorrow. There is no one but hath given up to the keeping of the death angel some loved one,—some treasure of their soul's affections? May they each and every one realize the ministry of souls, in the remembrance that all that have passed on, are ministering spirits. May they acknowledge and recognize their relations to the invisible world. May they so understand it, that they may become the recipients of the blessings that come from the spirits; and, inasmuch as we give to them with liberal hands, so may they scatter abroad the seeds of truth freely, that to each and every one may be given, so that they may enter into the more glorious companionship with these, and thus realize a more glorious field of labor, where the purposes and aims of the soul are to be stimulated, and there is to be a more universal desire for each and every one to seek for happiness, not for themselves alone, but that others may be blessed, and realize the beautiful and comforting inspirations that come to every child of the Infinite Father. We ask this as thy children, because we feel that we shall receive, and receiving, would also scatter it abroad.

LECTURE.

The subject to which I would call your attention this morning, shall be the "Cloud of witnesses." I would strive to define more perfectly those intimate relations that every human soul in material life holds, not only to the spiritual, but to the material spheres. I would strive to place before you in a clearer light, the responsibilities that are placed upon every human being, as there comes a truer and better understanding of these relations.

To a large majority of Spiritualists,—those who have become acquainted with the sublime unfoldings from the spirit world—there is a realising sense that they are ever surrounded by a cloud of witnesses,—all the dear ones that have passed into the spheres are with them, and with every new bereavement, every new trial, every new temptation that assails them along the pathway of life, the hope becomes stronger, their knowledge more perfect, so that they are indeed the objects of this gracious ministry, and the thought that they are not selfish to strive for their own development, but they are to look for the good of all,—not alone that your own woes and sorrows and doubts may be cleared away, but that you are so to understand and comprehend the relation that each specific act of your life bears to the immortal world, that you are to be enabled to determine what are the characters of this cloud of witnesses.

We do not suppose that any individual believes that they are surrounded by the same class of invisible spirits and that just the same are always to minister to them, that those who are related to them in the earth-life are always the class who are ministering to them in spiritual things. It is the varied condition of the mind of spirit that determines the nature and character of the influences that each soul attracts to itself. Were your spiritual visions opened daily, you would perceive the changes by which you are surrounded. These changes will account for those various experiences through which you pass; each hour of life presents some new experience, and each one awakens some hitherto undeveloped faculty or power of the soul.

Each night finds you different from what you were at the dawn of the morning light. You have gained a more extensive knowledge,—a knowledge that is the result of experience, the only true knowledge that the soul may ever become the possessor of.

We know that it is the desire of every human soul, that the cloud of witnesses by whom they are surrounded, should be of a nature that will lead them in the paths of purity and peace,—that will strengthen them when they are assailed by temptation.

Yourselves, to a large extent, have the power to determine what they so shall be. You have only to consider your relations to those who are yet embodied in the material form. What are the motives that are going forth from the center of your being toward the human family. Whenever you are brought in contact with them, what are the desires of your souls? Are they such as would cast out selfishness from the mind or soul, and lead you to consecrate every power of your being to the service of humanity, believing that he serves humanity best who serves his fellowman? He promotes his own happiness best who strives most fully and perfectly for the happiness of others.

I know that when a soul has been unfaithful to itself, to that deep interior sense of duty that speaks within every soul, there are oftentimes aspirations and desires, strong and intense for light. Every soul should remember that as ye sow so shall ye reap.

Have you been to others a power and strength? When sorrows have encompassed you, when you have been surrounded by trials and temptations, have you reposed beneath the heavy burdens which you were bearing, forgetful of the fact that there are other souls that are suffering in like manner? If you are forgetful of that fact, if you have been heedless of the wants and necessities of others, if you have forgotten to be a ministering spirit unto other human souls, how can you expect to receive bountifully of the light and truth from the spheres of spiritual existence that are beyond?

It is not enough to have an intense desire to be led in the ways of purity and peace,—to have a more perfect realizing sense of that glorious home to which the spirits are bound. These can never exert a saving power over any human soul, except there is coupled therewith a desire to become the saviors of others; unless there is an entire spirit of self-forgetfulness, that makes the soul forgetful of its own woes and sorrows in its desire to benefit others.

As a dweller in the spiritual spheres, my views since I left material life, have been essentially changed. I was bound by chains so that I had scarcely any true perception of the spirit life. So cramped and limited were the unfoldments of my spirit, that I had no wise and true conception of the Great Father, or of his children after they had passed through the change of death. I found on entering this life that I was obliged to become a learner from those whom I had supposed, while in the form, I was vastly superior to. They were in a better condition when they entered spirit life. They had no burdens to lay down—never having had any very dogmatic religious views and false ideas to be relieved of. I was obliged to go to some of these for aid and assistance, before I could free myself from the chains by which I was bound. When I perceived that many a word that I had spoken, and many an idea that I had entertained, had fastened a shadow upon some other persons, there came to me an overwhelming desire to return to earth and work for humanity.

Before I could speak through mortal lips or control a human organism, it was necessary that I should become acquainted with the relations that spirits and mortals hold to each other. After considerable labor and experience here, I have been enabled to enter again upon the work of teaching, and I propose this morning to give you a few of those experiences. I have watched what is to you the invisible realm of life and the varied influences that surround human souls, and seen how these influences are drawn there by your own interior conditions. I have been many years in the spirit world, and I have watched many persons until they have passed through the change at death. I have noticed the cloud of witnesses that have accompanied them to the spirit world—a cloud of witnesses that seemed to raise up, as it were in judgment against them, and open to them a realizing sense of the responsibilities which rested upon them. I remembered when I was in the earth-life, one who dealt out destruction to many a human soul in the sale of intoxicating beverages. I thought I would watch the cloud of witnesses that he was drawing to Himself, and which were unfolding conditions and throwing out their accursed influences. I saw this man a member of a Christian church, believing that he had made his calling and election sure, he said: "I believe, Lord, help thou mine unbelief." He had supposed that he would enter into happiness in the conditions of immortality, because of his belief.

I watched the unfoldment of his spiritual life, and saw what was his true condition when he entered that life, of which he was utterly ignorant. When I saw him with this assurance in his soul, that his happiness was thus secured, a professing Christian, who was not conscious of its first principles, he did not seem to be conscious of it. For when one of these victims of intemperance had come to him with their hard earnings, and although his wife had protested against it, yet he would continue to take these, and see him going home to his family, imbruted by that which he had taken. He saw the strife and inharmony, the suffering and desolation, the sad and blighting influences that were brought upon that innocent family. Still, I saw this man hold his head proudly erect. I saw wealth rolling in upon him, and his power increasing among men. He was put in places of responsibility and trust, and was looked up to by the multitude. I saw him when this miserable victim of intemperance passed to the spirit world. It had sent him out a poor, trembling soul into the untried realm of spiritual existence. I saw the widow of this poor man go to him for relief, for he was not only his victim but his tenant. I saw her in sorrow and distress go to him and plead for mercy, and that he would not turn her and her little children out homeless into the world; that in their destitution and poverty he would aid them.

Then, I saw this so-called Christian man tell her to depart from his presence. I saw him ruthlessly turn her into the street.

I watched the course of that poor woman, as unfriended and unpitied, she struggled through life and passed through the change of death; and in the world of spirits was passing through the change, I saw those ministering spirits who stood by her side, and revealed to her glorious visions of the hereafter.

When her body was put in a pauper's grave, no tears of pity fell from loving friends, none, save orphan children were there to weep. I saw the cloud of witnesses that were with her on her entrance into spirit life, and in the midst of poverty and destitution, her agony and suffering, there had been no thought of vindictiveness or hatred to the man who had been her companion, who had been so false to the vows he had taken when he led her to the altar. She had ever been tender and hopeful, that there might be for him better days. She had been faithful into the end, and she had drawn a cloud of witnesses around her, who sustained her now.

There was another cloud of witnesses around him, who had ruined her husband. These rose up in stern array, when he passed through the portals into the invisible world. I saw her by him who had ruined her, blighted her life, made her heartless and homeless as far as regards earth life, but there was no thought, save forgiveness. The last words that passed from her lips were a prayer that she might find rest—and Father forgive him, he knoweth not what he doeth. Thus, as she entered the spiritual world, there was a compensation for her. The cloud of witnesses confirmed her, and she knew that she had been faithful, loving and pure; that with a right womanly sweetness, she had borne herself through all these trials, and great was the joy with which, in the world of spirits, she met the companion of her earthly life. He was a victim of conditions, and had been more sinned against, than sinning, and having been aided by other spirits, he was soon raised to a higher plane of life, and had been striving in some way to repay her for the sorrows and trials which he had inflicted upon her.

Not until this hour was she permitted to know that gracious ministration in spirit life, and to enter into possession of the great and glorious realities of that home of peace and love, of comfort and beauty, and a realization of her fondest hopes in the enjoyment of true love.

I saw that she had compassion for him who had wrought such ruin and desolation in the past. Then I saw, too, the hour came for him to enter into the spirit world, after long continued wrong, and daily growing more and more self-conceited—daily becoming more the object of the worship of the crowd. I saw him writhing in the agony of disease and pain, as his physical powers were slowly wearing out. There was a time for reflection, and through the long hours of the night, the cloud of witnesses rose up in stern array, and in the depths of his anguish with groans and sorrow, he realized as he never had before, that man can not be saved by profession; that there must be works as well as faith. He saw many things, and his friends said it was the wild muttering of the delirium that led him to speak as he did. When he saw dismal faces peering at him, they said it was his disordered imagination that presented the forms of many phantoms, that seemed to rise up in judgment. Many brothers and sisters called upon him and the man of God, as they called him, said of him, that he died with the hope of Christ in his soul. That there was no doubt he was saved, because he believed in the atonement.

The cloud of witnesses that were attendant upon him, knew that these visions that tormented him, were but the revelations of interior conditions that had been developed by himself.

The cloud of witnesses by whom he was surrounded, were with him when he entered the world of spirits, and among that cloud was many a soul, who, while in the form had been sunken low in the depths of degradation, and upon whom the chains had become so firmly riveted, that now they could not be broken. I saw them standing around him in stern array, and I saw him shrink from them, and return cursing for their cursing, and it was to him a pandemonium.

Then, I witnessed in that sorely tried and terrible hour, the cloud of witnesses around this woman as she approached this man. I perceived that he recognized her as the one whom he had cast off in her sorrow and destitution years before. I saw a great fear come upon him, lest she might accuse him; and when she kindly extended to him a helping hand, he could not take it, and it was a more terrible retribution than all the cursing that he had heard. He turned away, unwilling to receive the ministration; but I knew there would come a time when this very soul will be able to accept such help—but such is the condition of many spirits that they are not able to accept such help, but when the right conditions have been developed, and then there comes out an inspiration to be the recipient of favors in that direction. I saw this man turn away in anguish, for she was heaping coals of fire upon his head.

Have you met with nothing of this kind in your own experience? Have you not met those to whom you have been unkind, who have treated you with kindness? Did that produce happiness? It may have produced a higher appreciation of the character of the individual, and by a sense of that higher appreciation, it has also caused you to see your own unspeakable meanness, and so for a time there came a most rebellious feeling,—a feeling of anger that a mirror has been held up to you in which you could see yourself.

This is always a curative process, for this will by and by cause the persons to strive to better their condition; and when that desire is fully awakened, then the spirit is in a condition to seek for and receive the kindness that has been proffered before, and has been scorned, not because it was unappreciated, but because there was a condition then that would not allow it to be occupied; so for many a year, to continue the narrative of this individual, I perceive him to be suffering in his own spirit. He who, in his earth-life, had been the companion of the wealthy and proud, was now obliged to seek, in what would be called the lowest society in the spirit world, a companionship which was not altogether congenial, because there were conditions in his own spirit that had assimilated him to those spirits, but yet conditions which he loathed; but this is only illustrative of thousands and tens of thousands of lives.

The great cloud of witnesses will accompany them into the spirit life, and there are those that witness against you if you have been false to truth; if you have been false to your duties to humanity.

They do it not in the spirit of anger, but it may be in the spirit of love. We know that the spiritual life is ample enough for the reformatory process, to be exercised towards all the children of our Father.

I know that there is a very large class of individuals who say that this principle, as advocated by Spiritualists, is calculated to undermine morality, and take away the idea of any necessity of doing right; that there is no inducement offered to do right.

I know there are those who are vastly concerned lest some individuals will not get their rightful dues. It is not days, nor months, nor years that determines the question of individual suffering. I have seen this illustrated in the fact that my life is a thousand years. I have seen them writhing in mental torture and anguish, that was illustrative of the law of compensation,—an embodiment of suffering enough to satisfy even the most vindictive of mortals. It does not require an eternity in order to work out the salvation of an individual soul. It does not necessarily imply length of years of suffering, in order that compensation may be given to each individual, for the great laws of life here being so arranged that each soul must become for itself its own savior, it must work out its own salvation; it must have remedies applied, and when these commence their curative work the first process is the awakening of desires on the part of the spirit to undo, so far as it is possible, the mischief and wrong it has perpetrated in this life. So there is a cloud of witnesses surrounding all earth's children, who are here with you to work out their own salvation. There are many on the earth who have been victims of wrong and injustice from these, and they come to search out these, for they must become to them ministering spirits of good.

Oh, man or woman, whosoever thou art, who remembrest that there is one gone to the spirit world, that had for these feelings of hate,—that had wronged thee, a wrong for which thou hast suffered,—remember that by the great compensatory laws, that individual must be a witness against himself, and by this return shall all the injustice of the world be supplanted by justice; this shall all its wrong be supplanted by right. I might present numerous illustrations, but one more must suffice for this time.

There was a girl, fair and beautiful, innocent and pure. She trusted one who betrayed and ruined her, and she was lost, as the world counts it; lost—shunned and excluded from pure and virtuous society. Others, fair and young, were warned by Christian mothers not to speak to her, but to avoid her, and so there was no place for her seemingly in the wide world. He who had betrayed her was trusted and revered of men. It was said of him that he was a Christian; that he was moral and virtuous. Fathers pointed him out to their sons as a bright example, and said of him, "This is a self-made man." He was counted wise and great in the councils of the nation.

Lo! both these on their entrance into spirit life. I saw her that was once a fair young girl, who had been driven by the scorn of society, and lack of sympathy and pity, into the haunts of vice. There was no hand extended to aid or help her. I stood by her side in one of those dens of infamy, as the last feeble spark of life was fading away. By my side stood her spirit mother, who through poverty and suffering had been made prematurely old; that mother whose heart had been broken because of the fate of her child, and whose love had never failed her, though it could not be exercised with saving power for her child,—such was the ministering weight that had been on them. I saw the eyes of that poor forsaken girl, opening on the scenes of spiritual existence, and a look of serene joy played over her sorrow-stricken countenance, and her pallid face was lighted up with a smile, for she had loathed the life that she had been compelled to lead.

There were women hardened by crime and [illegible] and there was pity and tender tears dropping from eyes that were unused to weeping. There were deep and holy sympathies awakened. I saw in that hour many spirits gather from the spirit world, and strive to make some impression upon these hardened hearts. I saw when the last feeble breath went forth from that frail form, and I noted the reception of that poor spirit in the arms of her spirit mother.

Can there are those who say this is giving a premium for vice and crime—to say that one thus degraded was received in the arms of an angel. The angels knew that she had been more sinned against than sinning.

Was there no retribution? I tell you yes; for the soul that is false to itself, when it awakens to a sense of its responsibilities must suffer, and when the love-light that beamed from the eyes of that mother penetrated her, though there was no accusing word, yet great waves of agony, sorrow and desolation swept over that soul, and she would not be comforted. For every one of her sin-scarred years there was agony enough concentrated, there was that which even the very hardest heart—the most vindictive spirit might be satisfied with. We know that the law of compensation will always act, and that retribution—justice, of which you speak so much—acts interiorly upon the souls of men and women.

After a time, these tender, loving tones of the mother awakened holy aspirations, and brought at last peace, to still the tired and tremebling soul, and it was many a month before, in her meekness and abasement, she could hope that she was slowly, but surely, developing, and unfolding the powers of her spirit.

Have you thought that the condition of her soul was one of utter scorn toward him who had betrayed her, and that she prayed to her God that she might go forth with curses to him? No! but rather did she pray, "Father forgive him,—he knew not what he did." Rather did she pray that she might progress, and become a ministering spirit to others who were passing through similar temptations, and also to him who had ruined her; for the deeper the wrong, the greater the call for forgiveness, and the greater forgiveness that is exercised, the greater the development that is experienced.

Now she went forth to stand as a witness by the side of this man, and many a night did she strive to impress him with a sense of her presence, by the interior convictions, and at times there seemed to rise before him visions of the pale face of his victim, and there was no sleep came to him. It was not for this purpose that she came, but that she might stir the waters in his soul. She was one of the angels that come down to trouble the waters, that by and by he should find healing for him. After a time disease commenced its inroads upon him. He, too, with slow but sure steps, passed on towards that shadowy land—shadowy indeed to those who have been false to their relations to humanity, and as the shadows came near, and their blight fell over him, more keenly, more sensitively than ever before arose before him a sense of the great crime he had committed.

He, too, was a member of a Christian church, —great, I have said, in the councils of the nation; but he counted that as naught in that hour, when men thought it was raving delirium, but it was an awakened sense of personal responsibility.

He passed on to the other life, and eloquent words were spoken over his prostrate form. He was spoken of as one who was enjoying the companionship of the blessed, and had entered the company of "just men made perfect." His praise was echoed and re-echoed in many places. I saw here, too, the cloud of witnesses around him, and as with unfolded spiritual perceptions he perceived her whom he had so grossly wronged, there was in her gentle mien naught of scorn or contempt or accusation, but it was as though a scathing fire had passed over his soul. Again and again, with redoubled power, rolled the waves of sorrow and humiliation, but there was no progression for him until he had accepted her forgiveness, and until he had passed through a long retributive experience, and after some years in the spirit world that man, through fear and trembling, through many sad experiences, stands to-day in a higher condition, but he loves not to hear men speak his name as one who did well upon the earth. He remembers with sadness the deeds that were noted by the angels, and testified to by the cloud of witnesses that were around him.

There has been wrought out by him a higher condition, and to-day while he may feel glad to speak eloquent words, and quicken men's ideas on governmental powers, he has a greater work to do—to remove the errors of which he was guilty—to return to earth, and with strength and power to overcome human weakness.

It comes to this: that they who have been wrong doers—who have been engaged in any specific wrong—are, through the principles of retributive justice, when they have been raised to higher conditions, of necessity compelled, by the law of compensation, to visit the earth, and endeavor to remove those conditions which they themselves have helped to make. They must apply the remedies to the wrongs they have done. I might present many instances illustrative of this, had I time.

In conclusion I would adduce the practical application of the remarks that I have been making. It is that each human soul should recognize the nature of this cloud of witnesses that in every hour of life they are attracting toward themselves.

You need not fear the encroachments of undeveloped spirits. The laws of life and development are so arranged that they may be useful to you at all times, so long as you are positive to the conditions through which they have entered these undeveloped states. You may draw them to you, as those whom you can essentially aid and help, if you are always actuated by pure motives and noble purposes. I know there are those, even among Spiritualists, who say that they will have no undeveloped spirits near them; they will hold no communionship, no intercourse, with any but the higher order of spirits.

Whosoever thou art, oh! man or woman, thou art signally deceived. The very utterance of such sentiments as these—the expression of such pharisaical pride—shows that thou art on a plane of life that will attract such spirits to thee. The man or woman who says, "I will be true to myself in every hour, every moment, and every duty shall be performed in the best manner I can, and I will determine, as far as I can, what is duty, and I will say to inclination, if it should not concur therein, "Stand aside." When this is the case, the cloud of witnesses around you will be such as you need not fear. There are many undeveloped spirits come to you, they will be there to receive a benefit, and you will not be so far removed from the good and true spirits, but that they will ever be ready to clasp hands with you, and they can do this the more readily the more you aid those who are on the lower plane. It is a divine bond of union that binds soul with soul, and draws you to aid all that you can. The true soul feels that it wants to reach down to the very lowest child of God and help it, and with this Godlike feeling and desire, it comprehends all, and by this earnestness of purpose and integrity of soul, it determines the character of the cloud of witnesses that are around it. So shall ye experience in every hour of life the peace that the world giveth not,—that passeth not away,—a peace that shall be sufficient for you in every trial, in every sorrow, and thus may ye ever be able to aid and help one another in love.

THE RAIN GOD, ELIJAH

By Luna Hutchison.

If the account given in the Bible (I. Kings, Chap. XVIII), of Elijah causing fire and rain to fall, in what is termed a miraculous manner, then the same things may be done under like conditions, since we have now found out, and are beginning to demonstrate that there never was a miracle performed only in accordance with law, although the law and its operations may not be understood.

If Elisha made iron to swim contrary to the known laws of gravitation, or Philip was caught up and transported to a distant city, then were these levitations performed by some law as yet unknown; but to deny, and say that such things cannot be done, in the face of facts to the contrary, is merely an assertion without proof.

Having myself been an eye-witness of the effects of the fearful phenomena related by Mr. Jewett, of which I have also heard from those present on the occasion, I think this, and all other strange facts, should be closely investigated.

One essential particular that was left out by Mr. J., which was related to me, and on which I based the solution of the mystery, was this: that the old Indian Prophet ordered a large fire to be built and kept up for some hours, thus causing a column of smoke to ascend from the dry, heated valley up to the strata of cool vapor which was passing from the surrounding mountains, it would supply the electrical and sponge-like conditions that the cool air from above would condense, and cause it to rain.

This would be in accordance with the conditions by which Elijah produced rain, for they had been burning sacrifices on Mt. Carmel from morning till evening, and as it was a test question to be decided, the Priests of Baal were, we may suppose, not sinning of fire, besides, Elijah had been previously told by the Lord that it should rain.

If we could know just what was meant by, "The Lord said" so and so, and the mode of the communication, we might find a solution to much of the past, as well as present, revelations of God to man, or spirits with mortals.

Before we prepare to discard present mysterious occurrences, we must first prove true, or reject, the like miraculous events that are given in what many claim as an infallible book, since Reason has now assumed its God-like attributes, to sit in judgment upon all history, both sacred and profane.

If mind and the laws by which it acts upon the invisible forces are really the controling power in the formation and development of worlds, and of reproductive life and its conditions upon them, then most assuredly must man come into the knowledge of the laws and conditions necessary in order to use them wisely for the best purposes of progressive life and happiness.

Owensville, Cal.

Spirit Artist.

Permit us to add our testimony to the many others who have had undeniable proof of the genuine mediumship of Mr. Milleson, the spirit artist. When he was invited to Little Falls by our worthy brother, Henry Link, we were not altogether satisfied of the truth of Spiritualism, but seeing the group of Link's family, and the likeness of Mrs. Link's brother, with others drawn by Mr. Milleson, we gave an order, and invited him to our home. All the family pictures were hidden away.

A group was commenced, John Hancock first, a beautiful unknown boy next, and to our great delight came our darling Freddie, in the arms of an unknown lady, Freddie appearing at the age of three and a half years, at the time of his grandmother's death. We did not expect to see him at that age, but were told in explanation that his grandmother had assisted him to come, and she recollected his looks at the time of her death more clearly, and could assist him to come at that age more perfectly.

This portrait is so perfect that not a soul, old or young, has failed to recognize it at first sight, and some of the neighbors were present when the first saw it, and will often climb up and kiss the glass over it, and talk to it, as though he could yet commune with them!

Some two weeks subsequent, Mr. Milleson was at the house of Mr. Link, and there produced another one, representing Freddie at the time of his death, when near four and a half years old. This one we had on exhibition at a fair held in Little Falls, and thousands of people saw it, and recognized it as excellent.

And here let me say that Mr. Milleson never saw a portrait of our Freddie. We never had a good photograph taken, and the one we did have, was when he was two and a half years old.

This, in our estimation, places Mr. Milleson beyond all doubt a genuine spirit artist, for we watched the progress of this work, and know that there was no copying or counterfeiting, for in a short time devoted to each one of the portraits made it impossible for any man without spirit help to have executed them. From three to four hours were given to each—drawn life-size, done with the point of a black lead pencil, and are wonderfully beautiful, correct in perspective, faultless in form, and exquisitely shaded. We have them handsomely framed, with pier glass over them, hung in our parlor, and we look upon them as priceless gems from the Summer Land.

We would say that we believe that any one, and all who will meet Mr. Milleson fairly and squarely, and give him the conditions necessary, one of which is, that he must be in the home and family circle of the earth friends of the departed—he will be as certain to leave, wherever he goes, the loved faces of absent ones, as he has been successful in Little Falls.

Yours truly, Anna Van Slyke, D. G. Van Slyke, Tunis Van Slyke.

The Twenty-Third Anniversary at Sackett's Harbor, N. Y.

The twenty-third anniversary of the advent of Spiritualism, was celebrated at Dr. D. S. Kimball's, where it has been observed for the last six years, by a respectable assemblage, in the following manner, viz., first, Mrs. Kimball came into the room, controlled against her will, by an Indian, Kenato, who, after shaking hands with those present, made some remarks in his Indian style, showing them what he had done, and was doing, to overcome a tendency to a roundness and curvature of the shoulders, and to expand the front of the chest. On returning to consciousness, after he left, she sang the "Golden Age," and was controlled again, and gave a beautiful lengthy invocation, suited to the occasion and times, when Dr. Kimball came forward, and after reading the epistle for Christmas day from first Hebrews, the first chapter, with appropriate remarks, adapted to the times, both then and now, read a lecture.

After the lecture, Mrs. K. saw and described several spirits present as E. V. Wilson does. Turning to the right, she said, "Some one has seen a man hung, with long whiskers, which he took great pride in pulling down with his hands. Says he ought not to have been hung for the crime alleged, although he was guilty."

Recognized.

She was then controlled and gave a splendid lecture for over an hour, concluding by the spirit controling describing quite a number of spirits of friends present, whose death she had previously predicted within a given time, and it came true. They had unnecessarily insulted her, and she predicted their death in the spirit, one in six weeks, the other within six months.

Then, turning to an old lady, she described her husband, son and father, to another, her brother, giving cheering words of consolation.

Then followed a lecture, which we have not space to give.

ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM.

A MANUAL OF
SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY
By Hudson Tuttle.

WITH PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR. Price $2.00; Postage 24c.

This work embodies the results of the author's researches and experience during the past twenty years, and is, without doubt, the most thorough presentation of the subject of Modern Spiritualism before the public.

Dealing, as it does, with a question in which the interest of all mankind is centered, it cannot fail to command universal attention.

While the experience of thousands will repudiate some of the conclusions the author arrives at, they will still be able to obtain much invaluable information from the book. It is a good book to place in the hands of every person who would know more of what it is that is waking the world to new hopes and aspirations, and planting a tree of life beside every man's door.

Discussion Between E. V. Wilson and Rev. Clark Braden.

[Notes taken during a Discussion on the Resolution,—"Resolved, That Modern Spiritualism is worthy of the support and confidence of the people."

E. V. WILSON affirms.—REV. CLARK BRADEN denies.

One other point in this connection—It is this: Every man is a law unto himself. We again reiterate we can not rise above the states of our associations and intellectual stand'ard. To illustrate: Mr. Braden, with others, chooses to follow the teachings of Dr. Campbell; Mr. Braden chooses to differ with some of his brethren. Is Mr. Braden a law unto himself in this matter? We answer, yes.

Mr. Wesley chose to deviate from the rules of the Episcopalian Church, and became the founder of the Methodists of to-day. Was Wesley a law unto himself, or did God personally order him to take this course? Calvin was a law unto himself as well as others. In fact, every great reform began in the individual, and culminated with the many; the individual taking the law into his own hands, and forcing others to comply with his terms.

I will instance in our own day, Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, John Brown, Susan B. Anthony, A. J. Davis, Beecher. To day in these peculiar views are backed up by millions, and of all the arbitrary assumptions of the law, Lloyd Garrison has won the greatest triumphs, and some of these accept modern Spiritualism.

2d.—We reply that the fact asserted that from the infancy of the race these things have been believed, is in and of itself evidence that the spiritual phenomena of all ages has commanded the confidence of the people, as the basis of their support. The fact referred to, that the physician dispels these views, is very damaging to the theories and views entertained and built up from the Old and New Testament. Would Dr. Hopkins, in this case, would have prescribed a dose of arsenic for Moses and Aaron, Samuel, Ezekiel, Isaiah, Daniel and Jonah, for Jesus, Paul and the apostles. And the learned doctors would have disproved the views of Jesus in referencing to the spirit of fever, the insane spirit, and others that Jesus tells us about. The scientist would (and do say to day) say to Moses, "Man alive, you are very foolish indeed to utter laws against familiar spirits and witches, for no such class of immortals have a being; how, there'ore, can men be influenced by them? You are superstitious, Moses."

The biologist and psychologist would say to Jesus at the wedding of Cana, I can do this, and because I can do it by my will power, you do it by your will power. These people are psychological, the water is not really wine, but is only water, and Jesus makes you think it is wine. Then we might go on and reason away every evidence of man's immortality both in the past and present.

4th.—Spiritualism teaches, first, that man is the highest ultimate in the physical law of life—the insensate law of life—and ultimates into a spiritual being. Spiritualism teaches that man is the only being God has ever spoken to, with and of, in this world, and the judgments of God are to be taken as spoken through and of man; hence, must ever be considered as of man, as he received it; hence, necessarily triturated with his individuality. The power above man, that rules him, we teach to be, first, law in finite, life and love in God; second, the angels, or spirits of every race preceding us; third, the spirits of our own departed ones. We teach that we, in our own good judgment, must determine the good or evil of these things.

In Mr. Braden's concession of the possibility of these things being done by spirits, we hold he makes our system worthy the investigation of the people. In his willingness to become a Spiritualist if it can be proved to be true, we find another feature appealing to the people for support.

In Mr. Braden's denial that these things are not of the spirits out of the body, we find no argument whatever; it is simply a denial; hence, amounts to nothing.

In his claim that the tricksters can duplicate these things, and because they may and can be imitated, therefore they are not of spirits—proves nothing—is not logical.

A may be truly called to preach the word of God, and does so—is honest and truthful. B, a rascal at heart, finds that preaching pays better than third work, puts on a sanctified face, goes to preaching, is eloquent, and his large audiences, makes converts; therefore, because B, the rascal can preach as well as A, A. is no better than B. and both sermons are untruthful.

"You must show me these things so clear there can be no mistaking them." Well, they have been so clear to every candid inquirer that thousands believe. We see with our eyes, hear with our ears, handle with our hands, and know of these things are so. In proving a crime, we do not ask that the witness shall reproduce the crime in order to satisfy the jury that a crime has been committed, but to state what he knows on the evidence of his senses. I have seen a spirit, I have heard them talk, I have had them take me by the hand and shake hands with me. I have had them come and go at my request, I have seen them play on musical instruments, write with pencil and pen outside of help from, and independent of, any human agency, and many other things, more than could be repeated during the time allotted to this discussion.

To draw the line between the true and the false, or that which is of the man, and that which is of the spirit, under the law, is a nice point indeed, and as difficult as it would be to determine who are of the Holy Spirit and who are not, at a revival meeting—we must wait and watch.

I know of no better rule than that laid down by Paul, "Prove all things, and hold fast that which is good."

5th.—To these positions we reply that Professor B's experiment proves, first, that the boy read what he did not see; second, what he did not know; third, what he could not remember after he had read it; fourth, that while he was reading in his own voice he was speaking the thoughts of an other not seen or heard; fifth, that other was many feet from the boy; sixth, notwithstanding the boy was the speaker, another spoke through him. Hence, the boy was the medium through which H. acted and spoke.

In Upham's Philosophy, the girl phenomena presents the following ideas: First, was the minister dead at the time this took place? Second, was it not the spirit of the minister who spoke through her?

Now, had I been present at either of these experiments, I would have asked, first, is there a spirit present, speaking through this person? Second, what is your name? Third, where did you live? Fourth, when and where did you die? And we would have had very different data on which to rest our conclusions.

But suppose we apply Mr. Braden's rule to other cases, and we reach an easier conclusion than spirits or clairvoyance. That is, that there was collusion and trickery on the part of H., and his boy; on the part of Upham and his girl.

6th.—We reply of Plato, that there was a case of independent mental action, not in the mind of Plato or his subject.

So far as the drowning argument may be concerned, the rapid action of the mind is not sustained by experience. In my own case, my only thought was to save myself, so long as I was conscious, and under conscious effort was at an end, I remember being with many persons. A paper read some two years ago before a congress of savans, dispels the theory entirely, for the paper stated that out of some twenty cases, only two or three had any conscious recollection, outside of the effort to save themselves.

In reference to the case of Robert Braden, the following features are before us:

1st.—The man was insane, and unconscious of what he was saying or doing.

2nd.—Had been so for some time.

3rd.—Had not been at home for some time, and it is reasonable to suppose, had not seen the child.

4th.—The walls of the prison were between him and the outer world, and thirty-six miles away from his home.

5th.—None in the prison knew anything of the accident.

6th.—He, the father, saw the accident, and the clairvoyant phenomenon remained with him up to his death.

7th.—Robert Braden had not this power before this insanity.

Mr. Braden gives us this phenomena to disprove the facts of modern Spiritualism; but we accept them, and ask for more of the same sort.

We draw the following conclusions from the father's case:

1st.—The father was unconscious, was surrounded by solid walls, and far away.

2nd.—He was not in a mesmeric condition.

3rd.—That it was a clear case of spiritual phenomena, and that it is far more logical to account for it on the principle that the spirit of some one or more of his friends informed him, than from any other law or cause.

Thus we meet every position Mr. Braden has thus far presented, while he has not met a single point we have laid down.

Mr. Braden's Replication Says:

1st.—My friend misunderstood me. I do not ask him to descend into the domain of life and disease; but what part of it will he accept? Will he accept somnambulism, mesmerism, clairvoyance, as spiritual phenomena? Man is naturally a worshiping being, and must have an objective point in view. Purity and truth must be his watch word.

2nd.—We raise no objections to the constitution read by my friend on Tuesday night. It is what every man and woman in the room might accept. Our objection is that them is that they are too general, are not practical.

I raise no objections to his views on marriage—in fact, I accept of them in the main. Also, I accept fully, and make no objection to the law of maternity, as laid down by my friend; in fact, we endorse in the main, his views.

3rd.—On the phenomena of Spiritualism, we call the attention of our hearers to 1st.—Rappings. They are produced by juggiery, or by nervous odil force. Moving articles, or pondera ble matter, blowing upon horns, or talking through horns, controlling muscles for writing or painting, spirit photography, lights, hands, touch, lying and swindling, are all the results of trickery, or caused by a nervous odil force.

2nd.—Seeing and hearing spirits, as well as the healing by spirits, or doctoring under spirit control, are produced by trickery, electricity, magnetism, delusion or imagination.

3rd.—Mesmerism has been common to all ages.

4th.—Trance, somnambulism, lying spirits, talking with spirits, clairvoyance, speaking in tongues, writing, healing disease, freedom from limits of space, freedom from limits of time, speaking in tongues, are first results of disease, and come under the law of nervous odil force. In fact, every phenomena mentioned as coming under the head of Spiritualism, is produced by trickery, juggiery, or nervous odil force or disease. I, Reverend Clark Braden, believe it.

4th.—The question now is, shall we attribute this phenomena to spirits out of the body, or to the spirits in the body?

5th.—Mr. Braden sums up his position in the following statements:

Remarkable feats of strength by the somnambulist, the doings of the dancing dervishes, the fire eaters, mesmerized persons read, and do things that they know nothing about. The story of the minister's death, false alarm, and dishonesty in the Christian printing office, and the wondrous expression—"it is all round here." We have lots of phenomena. We want a little more than a splurge; for when I take hold of a thing, I like to know what it is. We have brought forward instances after instance, beyond the power and limits of the human body, and we may ask, what limits are there to these things? Does the mind ever forget? Why not the spirit in the body do these things? Conditions are determined by surrounding sounds and things. I have broken up many circles by my influence. Persons affected with mediumistic conditions have been cured by galvanic battery and electricity. Shall we give to the body more power, or guess at the cause? Milky way, or nebula theory proves there are stars unseen by the naked eye. The man in the light house, and the steamer fifteen miles away.

We must recognize a higher power in the body. There is a power in the spirit in the body that produces all of these things. I recognize a power above the embodied spirit. How do you know that this phenomena is not of the body?

6th.—Quotes from the papers A. J. Davis' denial of Spiritualism, and that at the best he is only a clairvoyant.

7th.—The committee appointed by the Spiritualist to report on spiritual phenomena, reported in this city in 1867 that nine tenths of all the phenomena produced by mediums were tricks.

To these Replications we Reply:

1st.—We have fully laid down in our opening speech that which we accept, and by which we expect to stand or fall. As to all the phenomena in the vast domain of life and disease, we say Mr. Braden might as well ask us to accept the acts of the Holy Rollers of Vermont, the shouting Methodists of central New York, the righteous Jerkers of Kentucky and Indiana, the shouting Methodists of the West, or of any other oddity that may appear from time to time in the world's history, as to ask us to accept of the mental and physical wonders of disease. And yet, I doubt not but that many cases treated by our medical practioners are really cases of direct or indirect spirit influence, or obsession, as of olden time. Man, a worshiping being, we admitted in our first and second opening remarks, and Mr. Braden can not reach up to a higher standard than we presented our hearers on Tuesday and Wednesday evenings, and above all other points, we call your attention to charity.

2nd.—We reply to the above endorsement, that it sustains us, and hence we repeat what Mr. Braden accepts, and let it go to our audience as evidence of the soundness of our views on these important questions.

3rd.—Well, there is an argument for you "what is an argument," as Captain Scudder would say. Is there any particle of thought or reason in this makeup of yours, Braden? Does he point to any one thing I have plead before this audience? Contrast this belief and say so of Rev. Clark Braden with the report of the London Dialectrical Society. This body appointed on the 10th of April, 1869, your sub committee have held forty meetings for purposes of experiment and tests. These meetings were held at the private residences of members of the committee, purposely to preclude the possibility of pre arrangements, collusion or contrivance. Every test that the combined intelligence of your committee could devise, has been tried with patience and perseverance. Your committee have combined facts which facts witnessed by them in their collective capacity, which facts were palpable to the senses, and their reality capable of demonstrable proof. Of your sub committee, four-fifths were wholly skeptical as to the reality of the alleged phenomena, firmly believing them to be the result either of imposture, of delusion, or of involuntary muscular action. At thirty four out of the forty meetings of your committee, some of these phenomena occurred. Definite views on the question. Such names as the following, are members of this society: Sir John Lubbock, Bart., F. R. S., Prof. Huxley, F. R. S., Lord Amberley, M. P., Mr. Serjeant Wilkins, Francis Power, M. D., associated with them, Prof. De Morgan, president of the Mathematical Society of London; C. F. Varley, C. E., Robert Chambers, Mr. and Mrs. S. C. Hall, William Howitt, and others of like eminence.

And the only argument offered by Mr. Braden is the oft-repeated cry of trickery, juggiery, delusion, and nervous odil force. I, Clark Braden, don't believe it.

4th.—Our senses are our authorities. Fire burns. I know it because I feel it and see it. The railroad train passes by. I know it is a railroad train. Why? I hear it and see it—have rode on it. My old friend, James Lampman, a schoolmate of mine forty years ago, met me last summer in Wisconsin. I knew him at sight, but he did not know me until I gave my name. I know him, and how? From memory and identification. I am in a room, see a chair move, a little girl, eight years old, the medium. I sit down in the chair, and it moves with me. I see it, hear it, feel it, know it. The chair and I together weigh two hundred and twenty-five pounds. The little girl weighs twenty-seven pounds. Now, the relative force of strength to weight without injury to the party, is as two to one; that is, he is an exceedingly stout man who can lift under twice his own weight, or draw it on the ground. And yet, this little girl, weighing only twenty-seven pounds, moved two hundred and twenty five pounds on a naked floor, in a chair without castors, moved without contact, ten and a half times her own weight—through the diseased condition, or an unconscious muscular action, or the nervous odil force. So with Mr. Braden's respected father; when insane, his vision is far better than when sane. Matter and distance are annihilated, not by normal, healthful strength, or sane conditions, or natural vision, but by an unhealthy physique and insane mind. Which is the most rational conclusion? Mr. Braden's spirit in the body, juggiery, trickery, delusion, unconscious insane mind action, or our positive philosophy of spirit helpers, seen and unseen?

5th.—We answer to the above mélange of twaddle, that it is a grand splurge of vapory generalities; a repetition of twice-told propositions containing neither argument, logic, facts or history. It is a speaking against time, for you and Mr. Braden know as well as I do, that not one in twenty of these propositions are within the limits of our resolution.

6th.—All we have to say to this statement, is, that it is false, unfounded, and a lie brought out by one anil sensational Powell, a disaffected Englishman, who came to America expecting to rule Spiritualism, and has proved a miserable failure.

7th.—To this allegation we reply as follows:

1st.—They were a self constituted committee of sore headed Spiritualists, who have proved failures, and every one rejected by us.

2nd.—They were not appointed by the convention to which they proposed to report.

3rd.—The convention rejected their report, as well as the committee.

4th.—Out of spite, and in revenge for the rejection of their report, and contrary to the voice of the convention, they filched the report from the speaker's table, and gave it to our enemies for publication.

To be Continued.

Semi-Annual Meeting of the Minnesota Association of Spiritualists.

In another column will be found a call for the above-mentioned meeting. There are many good workers in Minnesota, and Mrs. Harriet E. Pope, of Morristown, Secretary of the Association, is not second to any one in her good deeds to promote the cause. We hope the different localities will be well represented.

A Minister of the Gospel.

The RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, on the 27th of April, granted a Letter of Fellowship to Bro. O. B. Hazelton, a well-known public lecturer, residing at Mazomania, Wisconsin. He is by virtue thereof, legally, constituted a Regular Minister of the Gospel, and authorized to solemnize marriages.

The Journal.

This week's JOURNAL abounds in splendid articles, that can not fail to interest and instruct. It is becoming a great favorite with the liberal minds of the country.

Amusements.

CROSBY'S OPERA HOUSE.

Engagement extraordinary! The world-renowned Ravel-Martinetti Pantomime Troupe, for two weeks only. Commencing Monday evening, May 1, 1871. Performance will commence with the Ravel speciality of Jocko, or the Brazilian ape. To be followed by the beautiful ballet of "The Nymphs' Holiday." The wonderful child artist, Ignacio Martinetti, in his specialities. To conclude with the Ravel Fairy Trick Pantomime of the mystic gift. All productions are the sole property of the Original Ravel Troupe. Admission, 75c; gallery 50c; reserved seats, $1. Box Office open Saturday, at 9 A. M.

HOOLEY'S OPERA HOUSE.

Jester. Cinderella. Houses crammed nightly. The man with the talking hand. Sergt. Bark. Lightning drill. Frank Steele. Cow-bell solos. The best performance ever witnessed! The man with the talking hand is attracting considerable attention among theatre-goers, and the house is crowded nightly, as a just appreciation of his efforts to mystify the public. Cinderella is still on the boards, and is received with rounds of applause.

AIKEN'S MUSEUM.

Frank E. Aiken, Proprietor and manager. Thursday evening, April 27, benefit of Mr. R. E. Cooke, doorkeeper. The performance will commence with "Nine points of the law." To conclude with Horse-shoe Robinson; or the Battle of King's Mountain. Friday evening, benefit of John W. Blaisdell. Friday afternoon, grand extra matinee—benefit of Cy. Crouse, Charles Crouse, and Fred Bowman. We understand that Col. Wood intends taking charge of the Museum after this week. It is to be entirely renovated. He intends to favor the citizens of Chicago with a first-class Museum of curiosities.

DEARBORN THEATER.

Manning's Minstrels. Increasing popularity of the last great sensation, the "Century Plant." First week of the very laughable sketch, introducing Ricardo as Mlle. Clarissa Locos Parepa Patti, entitled, "That's my Sister." New songs, new jokes, new ballads. Monday, May 1st, benefit of William Van Fleet. In active preparation, with everything entirely new, an original and highly sensational burlesque, entitled "A-lad-in." The "Century Plant" is a decided hit, as is proven by the immense houses which greet its appearance every night. Billy Manning "knows how to keep a hotel," and his cosy theatre is constantly presenting something new for the public appreciation. From the preparations now being made for "A-lad-in," we opine it will be a grand success.

M'VICKER'S THEATRE.

Thursday, the great Comedian, Mr. J. E. Owens, will appear in his great specialty of Solon Shingle; and as Josh Butterby, in the three-act comedy of "The Victims." Friday and Saturday—Mr. Owens as Major Wellington De Boots and Solon Shingle. Saturday Matinee, "Married Life." Monday, "Self and Live Indian."

THE

Science of Evil;

OR

FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION.

BY JOEL MOODY.

—o:—

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL is a book of radical and startling thought. It gives a connected and logical statement of the FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION, and clearly shows that without Evil there can be neither Morals, Science, Knowledge, or Human Action on earth. In fact, without Evil, man could not exist. This work fully solves the reconcilement, and unveils the MYSTERY OF EVIL, giving it a scientific meaning, and shows it to be THE LEVER WHICH MOVES THE MORAL AND INTELLECTUAL WORLD.

The book is a large 12 mo., of 348 pages, printed from large, clear type, on fine, heavy paper. Price, $1.75; postage, 20 cents.

 For sale, wholesale and retail, by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING House, 187 & 189 S. Clark St., Chicago.

THE BIBLE IN THE BALANCE,

A Book for the Age and the Times,

and one that should be in the hands of every liberal man and woman in the land.

You want it for your own instruction, that you may be furnished with acknowledged authority to meet the arguments of the theologian, historian, chronologist and scientific man with his own weapons.

It discusses the matter of Bible canons, versions, translations and revisions with ability, citing none but authors in the highest repute, and those that are above criticism.

The book is printed in excellent style, 12 mo., on new type and fine paper, with beautiful illustrations of the mounds and mound-relics of the Mississippi Valley.

It is substantially bound in cloth and contains three hundred and twenty pages.

The interest felt in the work is so great that orders were received for nearly the whole of the first edition before it was published, one party alone having received orders for over three hundred copies.

Price, $1.50; postage, 20 cents.

NEW EDITION—REVISED AND CORRECTED.

THE VOICES.

Three Poems.

VOICE OF SUPERSTITION.
VOICE OF NATURE.
VOICE OF A PEBBLE.

By Warren Sumner Barlow.

THIS volume is startling in its originality of purpose, and is entitled to much favorable consideration among sectarian bigots than any work that has hitherto appeared.

THE VOICE OF SUPERSTITION takes the creeds at their word, and proves by numerous quotations from the Bible that the God of Moses has been defeated by Satan, from the Garden of Eden to Mount Calvary!

THE VOICE OF NATURE represents God in the light of Reason and Philosophy—in His unchangeable and glorious attributes. While others have too often only demolished, it is written here as a beautiful Temple on the ruins of Superstition. Judge Baker, of New York, in his review of this poem, says: "It will unquestionably cause the author to be classed among the ablest and most gifted didactic poets of the age."

THE VOICE OF A PEBBLE delineates the individuality in matter and mind, fraternal Charity and Love.

The book is a repository of original thought, awakening noble conceptions of God and man, forcible and pleasing in style, and is one of the few works that will grow with its years and mature with the centuries. It is already admired by its thousands of readers.

Printed in beautiful type, on heavy, fine paper, bound in gilt beveled boards, in good style; nearly 200 pages. Price $1.50, postage 16 cents. Very liberal discount to the trade.

A WORK OF GREAT RESEARCH.

ONE RELIGION: MANY CREEDS.

BY ROSS WINANS.

"We object to what the Church demands, an unbounded and unjustifiable confidence in the infallibility of the writings of Moses and the prophets, and the Evangelists and the Apostles. We dissent from a sentimental attachment to an impossible compound of God and man. We protest that Christian theology, as we have it, is not taught by God himself, nor by Christ himself, nor by it in accordance with established facts, nor is it comprehensible by our reason. We would show you that Christianity, as taught among us, is no better than other systems taught in other than Christian countries, and in some respects not so good.

The historic part of the Bible, in relation to the creation of the world, has its counterpart also in the several systems of theology here mentioned. They all had their cosmologies based on equally good authority and equally wide of the truth, as that recorded in the Bible. The time and manner of the creation, no man has ever known, or ever will know, in this life; nor is such knowledge of importance in preparing us for the life to come."—EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

"SISTER, BE MY MESSENGER."

BY MRS. S. E. BALLARD MAYNARD.

Sister, sweet sister, if the Boatman come
To bear thee first across Death's mystic tide,
When thou hast reached thy far-off palace home,
Safe in the mysteries of the other side,—
Say, wilt thou linger at the shining portal,
Mindful, one moment, of my fond behest,
Pausing ere thou hast put off all the mortal
To waft some sign to tell me thou art blest?

Look thee, sweet sister, through these splendrous skies!
One there so like a very king will move,
Wearing still on his lip the radiant smiles
That first awakened all my soul to love.
Mark thee, if in the light of his proud eyes—
Matchless,—aye, even there, for power and soul,—
A spell-like charm, a subtle sweetness lies,
Holding thy spirit in supreme control.

Even by this, my lover thou shalt know—
His great and proud soul so ably newly wrought—
Bearing upon his broad, imperial brow
The noble impress of his nobler thought.
Glide thou then near him, sister fair,
Look, oh, so fondly in his wondrous eyes;
Mark, when he greets thee with his gracious air,
If in his look sweet recognition rise.

Then art so like to me, thou'lt surely move
Some sweet world-memories in my Guillaume's breast;
For deathless and immortal is our love,
Dwelling with him in realms one of the blest.
Tell him, oh! tell him how my fearless spirit
His image pure and bright through all these years;

DR. FAHNESTOCK'S THEORY.

By Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxon.

I find much in the controversy of Underhill and Fahnestock, which naturally provokes a reply, but as a long continuation of any additional controversy might prove irksome to your numerous readers, I have hitherto forborne taking a part therein.

I wish, however, to state here, that I have been acquainted with Dr. Fahnestock, and become somewhat familiar with his experiments, and feel it a duty to state that every well developed medium must be struck with the fallacy of his position. And even common intelligence must, if unprejudiced and critical, show that the doctor is defending his pet theory, at the expense of truth and equity. For with all due respect to the doctor's love of what he believes to be true, he must permit me to say the facts still prove he is mistaken. As one upon whom he has practiced his theory for several days, while entertained by his family, I have never for a moment felt to endorse his claim. I know that he is a powerful psychologist, and projects his choice of will upon his subjects, with intense power—the same as Prof. Britten, Stearns, Underhill and other operators do. It is this transfer of magnetic force, projected upon the passive, receptive organism or brain of the subject, in which the strong voluntary powers of the operator hold that organism as by a spell, that he accomplishes his object, and assumes it is all from the choice and action of the subject. He thus teaches the subject how to cure himself—see things at a distance, etc. Will the doctor admit there is such a power as fascination, with the serpent or any of the feline tribe, by which a spell is thrown over the victim? Will he admit that the dog can track his master through the various avenues of a great city, by following the path of his magnetic emanations? And if he asserts this to belong only to the realm of physical emanations, will he admit that approaching persons do sensibly affect individuals through walls and doors—so much so that the old adage has been founded thereon—"The devil is always near when you are talking about him?" Whatever the doctor may assume in these and similar cases, one fact is insurmountable.

The experience of every medium, of the finest and most susceptible class, is this—that sensations of receiving and imparting are as palpable to them, as a soft, gentle wind, or a current of heated air. And it is no mere imagination. They feel when they are drawn from, as sensibly as by the act of blood-letting. They are proportionally strengthened and depleted thereby, according to the force or power operating with them. When the doctor attempts to taboo the science of magnetism, as applied in the various mesmeric and psychological phenomena of the day, he places himself in open defiance of natural laws; for when he says that there is no such thing as magnetic transfer or impartation, let us ask him if magnetism is not an all-pervading element? Let us ask him if it has not its polarities, as seen and proven beyond disputation? And let us ask him if this property, denominated "terrestial magnetism," can not be imparted to such bodies as have an affinity therefor? Does not the loadstone and perfect magnet dispense of its vital force and power to iron and steel? Will the doctor take the ground that all those terms made use of in science, under the names of "magnetic equator," "magnetic meridian," "magnetic poles," "magnetic dip," "magnetic variation," etc., are without foundation? Does he pretend to say that this human organism is fashioned upon the natural order and harmony of the universe; that it contains both the elements and principles of organic formation—is governed by the same laws that rule the terrestial realm, and held by the same unbroken chain of attraction and repulsion, but that it is not magnetism—nor does man partake of any vital or essential portion thereof; but on the contrary it is all somnambulism—and this long word, which has spun itself out into such a long controversy, and left the subject just where it began, has taken possession of the universe, and become the mystery of all mysteries? Will somnambulism account for any of the long established and unquestioned phenomena of what we contend belongs to the realm of magnetic influence—this being the only proper term therefor?

It has always seemed to us that the doctor had taken up "a man of straw" as his pet theory, and he will pardon our candor, for considering our past experience under his instruction, we have kept still a long time.

We do not deny that somnambulism belongs to the realm of magnetic phenomena, but it is ridiculous to even tax our feeble mind, to contend that man is the final creation and complete compendium of organic law, but that the term magnetism is a misnomer, when applied to him!

Does this power of attraction exist in all bodies outside of man, subject to the law of polarities and variation, and the whole chain of positive influence, and not equally, or superiorly in man? Incredible!

ROSICRUCIAN MUSINGS.

By F. H. Dowd.

One damp, cold, wintry day, as plodding my lonely way among strangers, in the strange city of Philadelphia, I saw a strange sight, which was nothing more nor less, than a strange woman, in a strange position, among strangers, lonely and sad.

Fitful gusts of wind moaned sadly around the angles of the streets of the angular city, and cast themselves furiously in eddying whirls upon passers-by, pelting with drops of rain and occasional flakes of snow the upturned faces, or shielding umbrellas spread for protection.

Around the corner, as if to hide away from the face of the wind and the world, sat an old woman. Before her, against the wall, was a board suspended, upon which was spread balls of pop-corn, a few jars which had once contained candy and nuts, a few small boxes, and a broken basket with a few worm-eaten apples therein. A bonnet, altogether out of fashion, hid her face from me. She sat upon a little box, crouching over a kettle of smoking charcoal—knitting. Now and then she would stop the rapid motion of the long, blue, fleshless fingers, and warm them over the coals; and draw the threadbare shawl closer around shoulders which I imagine were once plump as yours, fair reader, and "bitch" a little closer to the bottom of hers. Well-dressed ladies and gentlemen hurried past the corner and the old woman, never pausing to purchase or to sympathize.

Anon she would look wistfully at her stand, and I fancied I heard a deep-drawn sigh escape the pinched lips. Then I wondered if her heart was cold and pinched also, and wishing to test my thought, I asked her the price of her apples. The fingers ceased their rapid, nervous motions, and methought a ray of hope lit up the darkened cavern of the old bonnet for a moment, as lights the darkness of the night the lightning's flash. But that moment was enough. A tear stood on the withered cheek. It were useless for me to go down into the tomb of a life almost gone, and drag to light the rotten past which she fain would forget and die, and so with a kind word and a little purchase I went my way among strangers in the strange City of Brotherly Love. But the wan face has haunted me to this hour, and the bony fingers are clutching at my very heart-strings, compelling me to muse; so here goes.

Was this woman one of the mothers of the land? Had she given to the country stalwart arms to produce wealth and uphold the government? Wherefore, then, should she be compelled to pave her way to the grave with tears and aching limbs, and fragments of a heart as warm and noble as your own mother's, kind reader? Why should she be compelled to sit down "around the corner," on the outside of sheltering walls which perhaps her own flesh and blood had toiled to rear, that some purse-proud aristocrat might roll in comfort? "Why, no," says the world, "there is the poor house." Ah, indeed! that is a place. I hadn't thought of that. She certainly has a right to be a pauper. "Oh no, she has no right to be a pauper, but we give her that privilege rather than have her stuck under our perfumed noses with the stench of her decaying bones."

The poor have no rights save that of suffering; and society is under no obligations to the mothers of the land, save such as the wealthy may in their magnanimity dole out to them in shape of public or private charities.

Charity? Who asks for charity? The trembling, old-handed old woman, sitting over the kettle of coals, would die rather than beg. But she feels, as any true heart must feel, that she has a right to the necessaries of life, and that society (which means government) owes her a decent living and place to die in, and a decent burial. What a rebuke and protest that old woman must be, sitting there at the corner, against the extravagance and pride rolling past her, or standing in solemn mockery all around, provided such had any sense or humanity.

Just across the way stood the Church of the Redeemer, where were gorgeous carpets and richly cushioned pews; whose every brick contains a million echoes of the name of him who wept with the poor, and had not where to lay his head, and who for his earnest rebuke of the hollow worship of Mammon, was murdured by just such as these who passed by the old woman—who for a pretense make long prayers, and for the Church of God rob widow's houses, and in the hollow mockery of charity send such as she at the corner to the poor house.

You want God in the Constitution, do you? Better have him in your hearts first.

"Whoso seeth his brother's (or sister's) need, and shutteth up the bowels of his compassion against him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"

I am glad the mothers of the land will soon be heard in the legislative halls of this republic. God hasten the day! Then shall offer the following amendment to the Constitution:

Whereas, (you know it would not be legal without a "whereas") men (and women, too) have a natural and inalienable right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and by virtue of their existence have a natural and inalienable right to that which is necessary to perpetuate that existence;

Therefore, be it resolved, that it is the duty of all just governments to guarantee not only that life, but that which is actually necessary to support existence;

Therefore, be it enacted, etc.

"But won't we ladies have a fight for that clause, though? I tell you we must go into that tussle minus chignons and long dresses, for there will be tall talking as well as walking, and taller hair-pulling than was ever yet known at that menagerie called politely Washington.

Man without a woman in his heart is like a hollow tree, only fit for bats and owls to roost in, and for strange and unearthly sounds to issue from. I rather have that old peanut woman tugging away at my heart than all the wealth of Philadelphia in my banks.

SOCRATIC.

By A. P. Bowman.

IS MAN FINITE?

If you answer, yes, then I should like to know how the little finite got the idea of infinite in his mind.

Can a finite mind conceive of infinitude in any sense?

Is not a finite mind bounded and limited on every side and in every direction?

How can a finite mind tell what an infinite can do, or what he cannot do,—whether he is personal or not personal in being; whether he can move or not move in his boundless infinity?

Is a mind safe in planking itself anywhere, in any position, so long as he is only finite, partial, and imperfect?

Had not all such who depend entirely on the infinity laying all around their finiteness for position and existence better acknowledge it in their soul worship as their God, in whom they "live, move, and have their being?"

If finite minds are limited in every direction, how has the conception of infinity ever entered the mind to begin with any thing? Would not a fountain as well rise above its head as for such finites to conceive or grasp infinity in any sense?

Must not the finite conceiver or receiver of his infinite ideal be great as the thing conceived or received into his mind—if not greater?

How can a man or mind lift himself up above nature, or grasp, think, or conceive anything better or greater than his own powers and capacities will admit of in some form or other?

If the infinite is not in the worshipers, talkers, writers, and fighters, who die fearlessly and bravely for their ideal infinity, we ask, where is he?

As every human mind reaches after infinity, is it finite?

Reader, did you ever try to limit yourself in any direction without instinctively reaching beyond your own limitations for infinity?

You make space boundless, time endless, state innumerable, and most desperately struggle for endless life yourself. Your mathematics will divide an atom into an infinite number of parts, or unite an infinite number of atoms into an endless sum. Your philosophy will fail to find the centre of the smallest pebble by reducing it to infinite smallness; neither can it find the circumference of the universe, on account of its infinitude. Again I ask, is man finite?

If mathematics and philosophy reveal infinity in a pebble and an atom, how is it that man is finite?

Is there anything finite belonging to an infinite?

The world, universe or God must be finite that contains a finite man and other finite things in it. Finites cannot be infinites in numbers, properties, qualities, attributes,—not in any way, shape or sense. They can only reach finite conditions, and end in finite results.

How can an infinite world, universe, or God be perfect with finite pebbles and atoms in it or him? Would not a few such atoms and pebbles spoil and botch the perfection and infinitude badly? May it not be that such a mixture is what ails the present system of divinity in church and state? Hence so many D. D.'s to doctor and patch up divinity for the people.

Does not infinity permeate and inherently bestow on everything connected with itself its own inherent attributes of infinity? Hence every atom of an infinite universe is pregnant with infinite results. The infinite in motion is life unendirg. The motion of one single atom in an infinite universe must result in moving the infinite. It vibrates endlessly and forevermore through the limitless infinitude. Infinites in motion can never cease activity, for they infinitely act upon each other forevermore. Finites must all play out, because they end in every direction. There is no eternal, endless life for finites, in any sense.

How can finites live forever? Would not that very power "to live forever" destroy the finite and prove them infinite?

Does not permutation teach us that endless life, motion, or change of position, depends on endless numbers, properties, or qualities? That two numbers can only make two changes of life; three can make six; four, twenty-four; and five one hundred and twenty. That no finite numbers can reach infinity. But infinity of numbers is a basis for infinite changes—endless life. And this very infinity of numbers in permutation imparts to every single number of the infinite family the powers and attributes of infinity.

Connected with infinity, every number can and must possess the power of infinite change, motion, life.

Again I ask: "Is man finite?"

I subscribe myself one.

MENTAL, OR MIND SCIENCE.

By Dr. E. B. Wheelock.

Spiritualism in its whole, is a system of universal philosophy, penetrating the entire realm of both spirit and matter.

Divided into parts, it may be used to illuminate, and serve to give wisdom to the world upon any subject or theme of interest to humanity.

The human mind is constituted of different mental elements, which may be diversified in action by different causes, and under different circumstances. By some, physical causes are only seen for the time being, while by other organizations the more interior causes are made perceptible, and their significance analysed.

Also, spirit illumination and inspiration may affect one mind, while physical causes or rudimental forms can only affect another. Hence, it is by natural causes that the diversity of gifts, and the diversity of mental manifestations, exist among mankind.

In order to make more plain the above statements, we will analyse in part, the mental elements inherent in the constitution of man.

And for the sake of system, we will adopt the following names as embracing in part the prime moving elements of man's mental constitution, with the uses and abuses of each, as might occur when acting in true or false relation to each other:

The first classification we may call the propensities, with names, uses and abuses, as follows:

Vivativeness.—Use, to preserve life. Abuse, too great a fear of death.

Alimentiveness.—Use, to prompt to take food. Abuse, drunkenness and gluttony.

Amativeness—Use, propagation of the species—affection for the opposite sex.

Parentiveness.—Use, protection to offspring. Abuse, too great a fondness for children.

Adhesiveness.—Use, attachment, friendship—love. Abuse, too great a fondness for society.

Combativeness.—Use, courage, self defense. Abuse, contention, quarrelling, war.

Destructiveness.—Use, to destroy animals for food. Abuse, anger, revenge.

Secretiveness—Use, prudence to conceal. Abuse, suspicion, deceit, lying.

Acquisitiveness.—Use, to provide for present and future wants. Abuse, is avarice and theft.

Constructiveness.—Use, to construct, build and invent. Abuse, too great a desire to invent.

The second classification we may call the sentiments, with names as follows:

Self Esteem.—Use, proper self-respect. Abuse, pride, and too great love of power.

Approbativeness.—Use, to gain the good will and esteem of others, proper ambition. Abuse, vanity, and too great a love of glory.

Cautiousness.—Use, circumspection, care—to keep from danger. Abuse, fear, melancholy, bashfulness, hesitation.

Benevolence.—Use, mercy, charity, and forgiveness. Abuse, relieving the lazy, idle, and unworthy.

Veneration.—To revere, respect, and reverance laws, parents, the Creator and His laws, and what is great and good. Abuse, servility and the worship of what is evil.

Firmness.—Use, perseverance, fortitude, and steadiness of purpose. Abuse, stubbornness, willfulness, and desperation.

Conscientiousness.—Use, perfect justice to all. Abuse, too great a sensitiveness.

Hope.—Use, to lead one to endeavor to obtain what the other faculties properly desire. Abuse, castle building, to great expectation.

Marvelousness.—Use, faith—confidence and proper belief. Abuse, credulity, fanaticism.

Ideality.—Use, desire of perfection—poetry. Abuse, fastidiousness—too great a disposition to raise the mind above reality.

Wit.—Use, cheerfulness, mirth, humor, and merited ridicule. Abuse, sarcasm, satire, too great a love of what is comic.

Imitation.—Use, natural language—to imitate in nature and the arts. Abuse, mimicry, forgery, and counterfeiting.

The third classification may be called the perceptive faculties, with names as follows:

Individuality—The observing faculty. Memory of things.

Form—Memory of persons—drawing.

Size—Judge of size, distance and perpendicularity.

Weight—Judgment of weight and gravity.

Coloring—Painting, flowers, beauties of nature.

Locality—Love of travel—memory of places.

Number—Love of figures, memory of numbers.

Order—Love of arrangement.

Eventuality—Love of history, memory of historical events.

Time—Chronology, time in music.

Tune—Tones in music, memory of sound.

Language—Memory of words.

The fourth and highest are the reflective faculties, as follows:

Comparison—Judgment, logical reason, analogy.

Causuality—Gives the power to reason abstractly—to love of metaphysics, and to trace effects to their causes.

Inference.—The power to draw conclusions from premises.

Agreeableness—Pleasantness, politeness, suavity.

Now, if the above faculties are a part and parcel of man's mental composition, both here and hereafter, how important it is that each of these constituent parts of man's immortal element, should receive a just and proper exercise, and culture in their growth and development, while connected with the rudimental body. It is the harmonious action of each of these that makes a happy and true man or woman.

To make combativeness, for instance, our darling pet, to the neglect of benevolence, and self-denial, would serve to throw the mental machine out of balance, and thereby cause inharmony in ourselves, and misery in others; or to make acquisitiveness our special favorite, to the neglect of conscientiousness, would produce the same results.

The same sin or evil follows, if we should constantly attend the so-called religious revivals of Christendom, and thereby stimulate or cultivate the organs of marvelousness and veneration, to the neglect of causuality and comparison, which latter leads to sound judgment and reason.

This would do violence to our mental constitution by throwing out of balance the harmonious working of other faculties,—thereby causing the mind to be self-conceited, superstitious, and bigoted, and serve to light up the fires of combativeness and destructiveness, which leads to persecution, slander, and ridicule of all opposers, and, if need be, make laws to whip, burn, and put to death as heritics, all who should chance to think, feel, or act different from their own blinded zeal.

For proof, read the history of any, and of all religions; or witness the intolerant, the slanderous, and persecuting spirit of the self-styled church-man of the present hour.

It is modern Spiritualism alone, as a scientific religion, that knows how to correct these errors and lead the misdirected mind into harmony, by giving equal and due exercise to each human faculty, and also by comprehending and wisely obeying the physiological law of embryotic development, as properly applied to the incoming generations of noble men and noble women.

Almost the entire inharmony of mankind today, is the legitimate result of the false impressions made upon a few of the human faculties by the so-called Christian church, to the neglect of all the rest. Human reason and judgment—the only true guide to the feelings—the Christian church, both Catholic and Protestant ever have, and still do ignore.

Not till reason and religion can harmonize and work together, as in the spiritual philosophy of the nineteenth century, can man and woman be true to themselves—to the world, to the angel spheres, and to God.

The sin of popular theology now lies at her own door. The church may agonize in prayer, or converse herself with pious hate, and deal damnation round the globe; her days are numbered; her power to lift the beheading ax is gone; her cry of "Infidel" no longer frightens the world moves.

Mind, ere long will triumph over matter, and all worlds will meet, and learn of each other—Amen.

SPIRITUALISM AT HARLEM.

Letter from Miss I. E. Armstrong

I like your paper the best of any religious paper I have ever read. I am delighted with its course in publishing the various reliable spiritual manifestations which are destined ere long to settle affirmatively the great question of the soul's immortality.

Now permit me to say a few words about Mr. Samuel Smith, of Rockford, who is an excellent trance speaker, and is esteemed by the Spiritualists as a very worthy man. The Pharisees esteem no Spiritualist worthy. Mr. Smith can converse with persons who are no way psychologized, in languages which, when he is not entranced, he does not at all understand. He was at my father's house on the evening of the 19th of September last. I was present at the time. He was entranced, and in a very animated manner began to speak in Latin, telling us that the Italian army were surrounding Rome. My father asked him if he could converse with him in English. He answered that he could not. My father then asked in Latin if Rome was about to be invested. He replied in the same language, "It is surrounded now, and the Pope is shut in." He manifested the utmost enthusiasm and was greatly elated by the transactions taking place at Rome. The spirit controlling said he was not a Catholic, and that he had been dead four years. He said a great many other things, for my father conversed with him nearly a quarter of an hour.

Now, we are certain that Mr. Smith does not understand the Latin language—as certain as we can be of any thing of that nature. After he had come out of the trance, he could not even tell me the meaning of the word senatum.

That Mr. Smith spoke Latin is not the only wonder in this matter, for at the very hour that he was relating these exciting transactions, the Italian army was completing its ebouchure, as he called it, around the Papal city. As has been stated, the message by Mr. Smith was on the 18th of September, which I was surprised to find confirmed by the daily papers of the 20th, two days afterward.

Mr. Smith also sees and describes spirits, telling their names, and in nearly every case they were recognised. He delivered a discourse at our school-house, six miles northeast of Rockford, last Sunday evening. The house was well filled, notwithstanding the efforts of some pious infidels to keep the people away. The discourse was on "The Beauties of the Spirit Spheres," and was itself transcendently beautiful. One pious individual present expressed his belief that it was the devil. An old gentleman who generally attends Methodist meetings, and who is somewhat noted for his wise and truthful remarks, said, "If the devil can preach like that, let him preach,—he won't do a bit of hurt;" and then added, "I like what the man says. I'm tired of the old fogy preaching; I have heard it for fifty years, and am tired of it."

Spiritualism has its foundation in nature, and will prevail, if not put down by force, by superstitious and wicked men. I think its ebb tide about here and at Rockford has now ceased and is returning to its flood.

Harlem, Ill.

Letter from H. Arnold.

BROTHER JONES:—Do not get it into your wise head that I have forgotten you. Nothing of the sort, for I would not be without the dear old JOURNAL for a small gold mine—no, sir.

You will find inclosed, $3.25, renewal of years' subscription from the 1st instant. I wish I could only make it a hundred subscribers, instead of only one; and yet they are after my papers almost before I read them myself.

Toronto, Canada, April 27, 1871.

VINELAND, N. J.—Mrs. Peter Van Voorhis writes.—My husband and myself have taken the JOURNAL and dear old BANNER since the first copies were printed, and I often look back to the time when we had no such precious weekly visitors, I wonder how we ever got along without them, and enjoyed life, but I do know we are very much happier.

WATERFORD, MICH.—F. J. Boring writes.—I have lately changed my place of residence, and I wish you to change my address. Am well pleased with your paper, think it is the cheapest and best paper that I ever subscribed for. Your "Search after God" is a good thing, and will be the means of opening the eyes of thousands that are now mentally blind, as I once was.

Voices from the People.

SPANISH RANCH, CAL.—D. Huntley writes.—In taking a retrospect of a "Search after God," in which I find the sublime God-man idea culminating in the grand realm of thought, the "Search" will result in the satisfaction that you made the effort, not thinking for a moment that you would find him only in the beauties of life and creation; and in our creations, I think, we know but little. I see you are to issue a book, entitled "The Hollow Globe." It is the first work of the kind that I ever saw likely to bring the world's thoughtful people to a deeper thought concerning this heretofore believed spherical body. It has been my opinion for years, and I have expressed the same to several of my friends now living and around in this country, that I had certain reasons to believe that the globe was hollow, and I think it will be entered similarly as sailing into the mouth of a conch, and the electric current has to be learned to make it a success, in my opinion.

OSWEGO, KANSAS.—A. Pickeny writes.—Permit me once more to greet you as a co-laborer in the field of human progress. And as an appreciative effort in behalf of the great and glorious cause of Spiritualism, allow me to present twenty names as trial subscribers for the JOURNAL, the true, fair, and fearless exponent of the Harmonial Philosophy. I can not in justice discriminate between the two contributors. They are all good, but as much has been said in regard to the "Search after God," I wish to say that he is indeed a pioneer worthy of the name, who would dare to take up his line of march through the grand laboratories of the past, and with the many records of antiquity, whose idea, though true to the experience and wisdom of ages past, give indeed but a vague and uncertain idea in relation to the great creating cause, but be especially ready to be admired and honored, who sets his course right onward, regardless of the cries of anathematizing priests and potentates, who stand ever ready with their gods of superstitious idolatry at every step upon the grand journey, and with threats of power and vengeance equal alone to God, demand servile obedience to their infernal mandates; with the much abused preface, "Thus saith the Lord," have the designing priesthood of the past and present endeavored to give credence and respectability to a very poor selection of ideas. The Bible, religion, history, God,—all things which we behold and realize, are but the identification of ideas. The power to ask a question, it is said, pre-supposes the ability to answer it; which, if true, to my mind places this "Search after God" in the attitude of a problem only capable of solution by the combined effort of all spiritual intelligences within the range of this planetary structure to which we are attached, and from which we were developed. This much, therefore, are we capable, in the aggregate, of understanding. This much will we know, in time, but myriads of ages in the future, in the past, will elapse before this grand problem will have been solved. Search on, dear brother, in the form and out of the form. Let the great and growing army of progress march steadily on, and present true time with the pulse notes of human experience,—and the grand swelling anthems of the spirit spheres,—each and every one coming nearer and nearer to God, as they are harmonizes with the truth and Nature's harmony.

NORTH FAIRFIELD, OHIO.—Benjamin Hill writes.—Your most excellent JOURNAL still greets me with its weekly visits, filled with its usual variety of most interesting matter. The "Search after God," although startling in its character, contains many valuable facts for the truth seeker. I trust at its conclusion to be made wiser by it. When you first proposed to send me the paper free my feelings rose up against it, for I thought it would be unjust to the section, but on second, it would be wrong to refuse it under the circumstances. Perhaps it might be as well to say that I am the only out spoken Spiritualist within a number of miles of here, and am subject to incessant attacks from my persistent opposers in and out of the churches. But, sir, I am a radical Spiritualist, soul and body, and with the help of the dear angels, I will speak in its defense on all proper occasions, until it is committed to other hands.

S. S. Bogaston, M. D., writes.—If God, through Christ, hath opened up a new and living way to heaven, no one friend can bless us with their presence here, then proclaim it. I am not a proclaimed Spiritualist, but a member of forty years' standing in the M. E. Church, and am investigating Spiritualism, and find it to open up to the soul of truth worthy of deep thought, honest research, and much earnest prayer. But the "Search after God" is most inconsistent with reason, and a slab to rational philosophy.

Remarks.—Some of the communications that we have received in reference to our "Search," amuse us very much, particularly those that are written under the impulse of the moment. Here is one brother who is a member of the Methodist church, been there for forty years! who has read a few of our articles, and straightway comes to the conclusion that they are sacrilegious. He exhibits but little wisdom in so hastily denouncing a position that he has not seen fully elaborated. The brother who writes this, believes that God made this earth out of nothing,—brought forth the whole universe in six days. We really have no patience to discuss this question with every Methodist who happens to take up the JOURNAL, and who has not the patience to investigate, and see our true position. He, perhaps, does not know that this question is being discussed in the spirit world, to day, as extensively as on earth. The chains of bondage that bind the brother down, may be seen in the declaration of "God through Christ," etc. Now, Spiritualists only consider Christ a man, a position which would almost appall him. Letters are received here very frequently from good orthodox Christians, telling how the JOURNAL should be conducted, and what character of articles we should publish.

PALATINE, ILL.—J. P. Baldwin writes.—Inclosed you will find fifty cents, for a new subscriber for the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL. Please send this week's JOURNAL, number five, too. I want he should have the contents on the first page of this paper,—it is worth the fifty cents, let alone the rest of it, papers which is equally as good, if not better, and especially the "Search after God." I have never seen him yet, but have learned more about him than I ever knew before, since the "Search" has begun.

YUBA CITY, CAL.—I have read but three of the communications, the last of which was in the issue of April 15th, and I am sorry to notice that after so long a search, Spirit has failed to find God. I have wondered much how any one who sought, could fail to find one who is everywhere present. O, how I pity that spirit who is so far from God, so benighted; or, in other words, so blind that he can not see or find him who displays himself wherever the eye may rest, or our thoughts wander.

Remarks.—The writer of the above,—a lady—don't give her name—has seen three numbers of the JOURNAL, and she is exceedingly annoyed at our persistency, and bewildered at the determination manifested in our "Search." She thinks that at some future time, she will subscribe for the JOURNAL. We hope she will—then she can have free license to criticise, to find fault with our want of sight in not being able to see God. She says God is in everything. So we thought once, but changed our mind, as a dear school mate was bitten by a rabid dog, and after suffering untold pains, died in the greatest agony—we fail now to see God in those teeth that sent to heavitals the poison. We desire the orthodox who read the JOURNAL once or twice, to send in their views of the same, and give such advice as they may deem proper. After reading their scintillations, we will send the letters to the mill to be made into paper for the JOURNAL, thereby giving a practical turn to their good intentions, and serving humanity in a way templated.

LITERARY.

The Science of Evil; or First Principles of Human Action, together with Three Lectures by Joel Moody. Published by Crane & Byron, Topeka, Kansas. Religio-Philosophical Publishing House, Chicago.

The above is the title of a book that must, sooner or later, rank its author among the first class of literary and metaphysical writers of the country. It is a work of great research, deep thought, and sound reasoning, and showing a mind conversant with history, philosophy, and the sciences.

Had this book been heralded to the public from an old, Eastern publishing house, with the name of some well-known author, even with half its merits, or had it been published anonymously, it would have met with an immense sale, and given great satisfaction to the readers, except where it conflicted with religious prejudices.

In his introduction the author very truly says: "Evil has long bewildered the thinking world. Why evil is, has long been a complex question. Since the dawn of history the theological man has embraced a scientific fact." To dispel this notion and lay bare the fact, and thus answer the question is a radical object of the author in the book, and he has certainly succeeded, beyond any other author of this century.

In his first chapter, he treats of the eternity of evil and the existence of facts universally accounted evil, the generalization of which he calls the "Science of Evil." Since these facts precede man, both individually and collectively, they cannot depend on any moral or religious code of man. He also shows that all systems of morals have their parentage in evil, which is certainly a novel course of reasoning, since all theological systems give their origin to the gods. The pre-existence of evil foretells the moral codes, as all science foretells events, which is its legitimate work.

His second chapter treats of the impossibility of human perfection; hence, the law of progression, with the moving power of evil ever pushing us upward and onward, as much a necessity as an engine or force-pump; conditions govern character, and variations are eternal as well as infinite in variety with the idols or ideals forever before us; as Jesus is the ideal man most largely worshiped by woman, while man has no ideal woman, and seeks his God elsewhere. Thus we progress, with evil forcing us up, and ideality drawing us, with what there is of free agency within us to resist or accelerate the progress.

The illustrations of the author are extremely ingenious, and his fables, like the parables in the New Testament, greatly strengthen the premises. If well put in, they are generally like brace in the frame-work of a building.

Chapter third treats of diversity in unity, and the "social evil," with some entirely new theories on this subject. On page 57 he says:

"The seeds of prostitution are sown in the animal world, far below man, creating an insatiable demand in the male, which no refinement of life, or moral codes can remedy. The fire is shut up from the hell of the lower world into the veins of man, and the race has yet been nothing distilled in the laboratory of morals that can extinguish it."

He cites the love, admiration, and almost worship of the females of all living species for the males, making no exception for intelligent beings, and bringing in many new ideas not presented by Darwin or Huxley, as well as presenting many of theirs.

On page 61 we read: "It is safe to affirm the difference between man and the monkey is only one of growth, not one of nature's plans, which would make us radically different."

Among the items, in summing up the first three chapters we note the following:

"It (evil) precedes all finite intelligence. Morality cannot be defined. Man must be forever imperfect. No perfect law can be given; if given, it could not be obeyed. Punishment is an inexorable law of nature;" with many others which are deduced from the principles in these three chapters.

Chapter fourth treats of Matter and Force, or the dual nature of the universe, and the subject is most ably handled, with Darwin's and Huxley's theories woven into the web that spreads out beyond them.

Chapter fifth treats of "the origin of morals and science," following these branches of mental culture to their roots in animal, vegetable, and mineral kingdoms.

On page 113 he says: "The religious sentiment in itself, is blind; it is an irresistible feeling,—an impulse which may drive mankind into a lust after God."

Page 114: "We assert that the feeling of fear is the primary cause of worship." The whole argument in this chapter is most admirable and complete.

In chapter sixth, the author goes on to show how theology evolves science, tracing its bigotry along its slow march under the kicks and cuffs of the church, that ever abused as it strengthened it.

On page 157 we note a quotation we never saw before, where he says Henry VI., of England, declared "that the clergy should engage in the search after the 'philosopher's stone,' for since they could change bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, they must also, by the help of God, succeed in transmuting the baser metals into gold." But it seems they have not yet succeeded.

"Who is it that scourges science? Theology! —nobody else;" and the kicks and cuffs advance it.

Page 168: "Evil is the lever which moves the intellectual and moral world. It begets knowledge by driving the animal away from ignorance."

Chapter seventh treats of "special evils."—murders, robberies, etc.,—and weaves these into the system of teaching so necessary for our progress,—somewhat on the New Testament plan,—in which it is said, "War unto him through whom the evil comes, etc." Let no one suppose the author justifies the guilty more than Christians do Judas, through whom their salvation came, but he thinks we could not dispense with them more than our Christian brethren could with Judas and the swearing Peter.

Page 184: "Moral evil, then, means wisdom. It continually cries, 'Get knowledge! and let the actor beware!'"

Page 189: "The evil called 'theft' is one of God's ministers; it is prophet, priest, and lawgiver."

These sentences are only quoted as some of the texts or conclusions to show the subject, and induce the reader to get the book, and get a rich treat of mental and intellectual food.

Page 201: "Without reason, love is lust. This also, like the religious faculty, has its sacred groves and caves, and mountains. It has its gods and goddesses, before whom mankind bow down and worship. Its idols have been made and broken in every land and every city of the world."

Page 203: "The scientific Cupid must have eyes."

Chapter eighth, of twenty pages, is devoted to the "social evil," about which so much has of late been written, and which is most thoroughly handled and scientifically treated in this work.

Page 218: "It is not the slave who must be killed to abolish slavery, nor the prostitute who must be harassed to destroy prostitution. The world is full of lessons already taught on this subject. Many times has both church and state been sunk in the great black sea of prostitution, blotting them out forever."

This chapter is the most complete digest of this subject we have yet seen in print, and suggests the true remedy for the evil, which no church and no legislation has yet reached with a cure, and scarcely with a palliative.

From page 230 to 342 are three of the most able and best written lectures we have read in the last year.

The first lecture is on Salvation and Damnation before birth, and, of course, conforms to the preceding principles of the work, but carries out the subject most thoroughly and exhaustively.

Page 236: "As the thief thinketh, so is he. As the prodigate thinketh, so is he. As the idiot thinketh, so is he. Yet who made the fool and the villain?"

He says if you roast the acorn before planting it, God Almighty could not make an oak tree from it. So God could not perfect the vegetable kingdom without the skill of man as a tool to work with.

Page 263: "Will the blood of Christ wash out the body's pollution, and prevent the transmission of disease?" "People can only be saved at the inner courts of purity, before they are born, designed in wisdom and begotten in love."

The second lecture, on "Sunday,—its History, Uses and Abuses," is worth the price of the book, and should be read by every body, and especially every Christian and Bible reader in the country.

The erroneous popular opinion about Easter Sunday, as well as many other errors is corrected. This lecture deserves to be delivered, as well as read, in all the churches and halls of the nation. Labor is one of the curses of God according to the Bible, and is forbidden on the holy day, and permitted on the other six. If it is a curse, it is not strange so many try to shun it at all times. Even the Fourth of July must not be celebrated on the holier Sunday, which, from heathen worshipers, had its name from the sun. Jesus set its authority aside, but the Church restored it, from Jewish customs, but changing the day.

The third, and last, lecture is on "Prayer—True and false Methods Compared." In this lecture, prayer for Christ's sake is shown up, as well as the ridiculous systems which Jesus so forcibly condemned, but which the churches have adopted—prayer to the Father on behalf of the Son, when Father and Son are one. True and false systems are most forcibly illustrated in this lecture, and a large amount of argument used to show the true or natural relation of man to his Creator, and the natural prayer of the soul in contrast with the weekly harangues of the popular preachers. Read the book, and you will be paid.

Criticism on the THEOLOGICAL IDEA OF DEITY,

Contrasting the Views Entertained of a Supreme Being by the Ancient Grecian Sages, with those of Moses and the Hebrew Writers; and blending Ancient Judaism, Paganism and Christianity into a Common Original.

THE CELEBRATED CRAIG MICROSCOPE

is an optical wonder; reveals the thousands of hidden wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES.

a power equal to other microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teeming with life, which, to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Itch Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of Eyes in the Single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed feathers, the mesh lands of Tricsius Spiralis or York Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of infinite value to professional men, to teachers and to students, but nowhere is it of greater value than on the family table, within the reach of every member. It will delight yourself, your children and friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanliness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, &c.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 microscope, and so simple in its construction that any child or man can understandingly and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present, Elegant, Instructive, Amusing; and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by thousands of Scientific Men, Parsons, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

PRICE $3.00.—Sent by Mail, Post-paid.

Every instrument is neatly boxed, and handsomely labeled with full directions for use. Thousands have been sold by mail.

MEDIUMS' DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete Directory, giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. This will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the location of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage. Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a lamentable fact that some mediums so forget their self-respect as to speak evil of other mediums, not unfrequently even of those who are far their superiors. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Register so soon as we have evidence sufficient for their indulgence in such unbecoming practices.

It should be borne in mind that the visiting mediums carry conditions with them, and are liable to speak—watch and observe the conditions which control the medium visited; he will not speak the truth, (for such facts) to certain persons, another better to others—all having their friends, and justly so, too, and all equally honest and useful in their place.

[PAUL AND JUDAS, Entering the Cave of JOHN THE BAPTIST.]

JESUS OF NAZARETH,

BY

PAUL AND JUDAS.

Through Alexander Smyth, Medium.

This work has been read with intense interest by thousands, and is universally pronounced the most in the whole line of Spiritualistic Literature. It is the only true and reliable history of the remarkable medium called Jesus, ever written. After wanting eighteen hundred years, PAUL and JUDAS, finding the times propitious, and an excellent medium through whom to communicate, have given to the world a book of lasting interest, by taking possession of Mr. Smyth about one hour in every twenty-four, usurping all his powers, giving a continued series of well-connected scenes, presenting scenery, characters and personages, dialogues and actions in their regular order and succession, embracing all the most important personages and incidents which occurred during the sojourn of Jesus upon earth. There was, probably, no book ever written in which such perfect life-pictures occur; every city and country village, every river, brook and mountain, and scenery in general, is so vividly portrayed that an actual journey through the country could hardly be more interesting. The characters in this unexampled drama are so faithfully portrayed, that, as you are introduced to each in turn, you seem well acquainted and delighted with your company, and the many points of interest you are called to visit. The book is replete with interest from beginning to end, and contains 319 closely-printed pages.

WONDERFUL BOOK

PRICE, $1.50; postage, 20 cents.

The Great MAGNETIC CURE.

Artificial Somnambulism.

The author of the above named book, is a philosopher of large experience and great merit.

In this work he treats of the philosophy of mind as demonstrated by personal experiments during the last twenty years. The work has ever been published which so thoroughly demonstrates many popular theories to be unfounded, and fallacious; and at the same time gives a rational theory for phenomena manifested.

DR. FAHNESTOCK is a thorough believer in spirit manifestations, and teaches in this work the modus operandi, to a demonstration.

The following is the table of contents of this valuable work.

CHAP. I.—HISTORICAL SURVEY. Mesmer not the discoverer of the principles of his theory of it—the examination by the French commissioners—Their conclusions—The author's remarks.

CHAP. II.—Of the causes which have retarded the progress of the science.

CHAP. III.—Of the conditions necessary for the production of somnambulic state, with instructions how to enter it, etc.: I.—Of the instructor or "operator." II.—Of the patient. III.—Instructions. IV.—Of the somnambulous exaltation by those who enter this state. V.—Of their awaking.

TERMS OF THE

Religio-Philosophical Journal.

$3,00 per year, $1,50—6 months, $1,—4mo.

☞ Fifty Cents for Three Months on trial TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or POST-OFFICE MONEY ORDER, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but ALWAYS IN A REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to FIFTEEN CENTS, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. All Postmasters are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $2.50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names ENTERED on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscription, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office.

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to Dec. 16th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith J.—16 Dec.—0." If it means 1870. If he has only paid to Dec. 16th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—16 Dec.—0, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as 70 for 1870, or 69 for 1869.

☞ Those sending money to this office for the JOURNAL, should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

NUMBER XXXVIII.

Wonderful Power of Man on Earth—He Stands in New York and moves objects in Europe—Liberating the Activities of Matter—Individualized Intelligences Connected with the Operations of Nature—Power of Spirits after Millions of Years' Experience—The Guardians of Earth—Strange Accusations of Lucretius, who, all at once, Seems to See Imperfection in the Management of the Earth—Changes taking place on its Surface.

Spirit—The human mind, the conscious principle of man's organism, filled with lofty aspirations, in scanning the operations of those things with which it is surrounded, asks the question, Is it possible that this vast, complicated machinery is moved in compliance with certain forces inherent in it, eternal like matter, or is there something outside thereof, that superintends or directs the same? In the Spirit World there are many things, the operations of which I can not fully understand, and do not expect to until I arrive at a certain round in progression's ladder. It is useless for me to attempt to understand all the complex operations of the laws connected with matter and spirit, until I am brought in company with those that control them. The chemist can perform many wonderful experiments through the instrumentality of his knowledge, but it will be millions of years before he can so combine the forces of matter that they will produce a comet or planet. He can, standing in New York, as quick as a flash, raise an iron hammer in England, weighing two ounces, and as that little hammer strikes, the operator there can read his thoughts, can learn his most secret wishes. This is a strange power that the children of earth possess, to move an object, a little hammer, though a million miles distant, and through the instrumentality thereof, to communicate thoughts. Years ago, had any one of earth's children made the statement that a man standing in New York could move a piece of iron in England, and through the instrumentality thereof hold a conversation with his brother there, he would have been regarded as a fanatic, and a fit subject for the insane asylum. Now, let me tell you, that there are individualized intelligences that, standing in the center of a world system, can cause each planet to vibrate the same as that piece of iron attached to the magnetic battery in England is made to oscillate by the operator in New York City. The systems of worlds are beautifully interlinked, and are controlled by forces over which individualized intelligences have complete control. This is a wise arrangement, and in regard to which I shall at some future time speak more definitely. Now, knowledge is power. Knowledge enables you, standing in one place, to move a piece of iron far distant. Knowledge enables individualized intelligences to perform operations you ascribe to a God.

Lucretus—True, a man standing in New York can move a piece of iron in England, but does that infer he can improve the regions of space?

Spirit—I was merely alluding to power possessed by the children of earth. In the magnetic telegraph, we have certain forces obedient to the wishes of man when aroused. Without the aid of zinc, copper, and a chemical solution, you could not well arouse the activities of matter, in the manner described, but unite the three, and the result is, a force is liberated in New York, that moves an object in England. In the Spirit World, among the higher order of intelligences, we find some devoted exclusively to experimenting with the forces of matter. The children of earth can liberate a force that will instantly move a solid body millions of miles distant; but that is just the first step in experimenting with Nature. The chemists of the Spirit World can control the forces that will evolve from matter a comet, or cause the sun to throw off matter sufficient to make a planet as large as Jupiter. In each system of worlds, there is a central pivot, or base of operations. From that are established grand currents of force, that the supervising intelligences there can control as easily as the operator can the currents of electricity that traverse the Atlantic Cable. There is in the Spirit World, the most complete system of action on the part of those engaged in superintending the same.

Lucretus—He who inaugurates this system of worlds, truly must be a God.

Spirit—Not by any means. Even the children of earth understand many of the beautiful laws connected with world making. There is a beautiful mathematical law observed in the location of each planet, which has been fully explained before. All worlds in the regions of space are arranged in accordance with mathematical rules. The size, weight, and the position of each planet, is determined before made. There are engineers in the Spirit World, as well as here.

Lucretus—Engineers? please explain!

Spirit—In the vast, unexplored regions of space, these engineers may be found, arranging for improvements that will follow. They arouse certain activities therein, and are then followed in turn by other circles of spirits, each of which have their appropriate work. In the fields of space, in the unexplored regions thereof, it is night, as it were.

Lucretus—You seem to connect individualized intelligences with all the operations of nature.

Spirit—Which is the most reasonable, to connect those who are individualized like ourselves, with the vast improvements going on in the regions of space, or one Infinite Being, diffused throughout the whole universe, and whom humanity have failed to recognize? We know that individualized intelligences are connected with certain improvements on the surface of the earth, and why not in the regions of space? We do not see God connected with any enterprises on the surface of the earth. If not there, why in the regions of space?

Lucretus—Did not the hailstone unfold itself through the action of Nature's laws? Did not the elements there that could not see, hear, feel or think, form a perfect sphere that bear evidence of a design? And, if the elements can unite and form a hailstone, bearing evidence of a design, why not the earth?—(See Numbers 20 and 21)

Spirit—True. The elements could not act without being organized. The engine, when certain conditions are obeyed, moves the ponderous wheels. Conditions are always required in the action of all the elements. You can not liberate force from ice unless heat be applied thereto. Force is not matter, yet it is incorporated therewith; that is, it is not matter in the sense in which the world uses the term. The force that moves the train of cars is in the water. Fire will liberate it. That force, before the fire is applied, is inactive or in a negative condition. Matter acts in accordance with certain well-defined conditions. Unless they are complied with, no result follows.

Lucretus—Man, then, has creation in his own hands. There is no one to dispute with him the leadership. No one for him to pay homage to. He gazes at the heavens, at the twinkling stars there, at the vast fields of space, and exultingly exclaims, Man did all this! No one to pay homage to!

Spirit—You seem to lament when thinking of the grandeur of man's destiny. You recognize a God. In your heart, you feel that all this is beyond the power of man. If he, residing on this earth, can, in a few brief years of existence, with a battery no larger than a lady's thimble, and a drop of water no larger than a tear, move in England, a piece of iron weighing two ounces, and through the motion thereof, communicate his thoughts, may he not after quintillions of years of experience, command a force that shall move a planet? Remember, too, that this is merely a rudimentary existence; still man makes rapid strides here. Standing in New York with a little battery, without a particle of exertion on his part, he can move an object in Europe,—may he not with millions of years of experience, control a power that shall move the earth? This earth does move, turns on its axis once in twenty-four hours. Certain forces cause it to move. Those forces are under the control of some one, or are not. On earth, you see no force exerted in the movement of anything that is not under the control of intelligences. In the movements of the earth, force is exerted, and is just as much under the control of intelligences, as the force which moves the engine. To say that the force that moves the earth is not controlled, but controls itself, and wisely subserves certain ends, would only make a God out of it. Nature's laws, nature's forces, are what the Materialists worship. Matter, they claim, has certain inherent laws, and from the natural tendency thereof, planets, comets, stars, animals and men, etc., were brought into existence. Now, an inherent tendency is the great weapon which the Materialists use. They recognize the operation of matter, and exultingly exclaim, No Infinite Intelligence connected therewith!—No finite intelligence has any thing to do with it! If their theory be true, the universe, in all its completeness, was brought forth by laws that can not think, hear, see, feel or conceive. But experience teaches me that such is not the case, I know that such is not the case. There is a circle of spirits who have exclusive control over the earth, and who are gradually changing its physical condition, its polar inclination. Years ago, the north pole was not where it is now, and various other changes are transpiring through their action. They can control the atmosphere, as easily as the engineer can his engine; can induce a violent tornado or furious storm.

Lucretus—Why not do their work better then? Why cause such tornadoes, water-spouts, furious storms, and showers of hail? I have seen whole sections devastated by a tornado, and fertile fields destroyed by an inundation. I have seen hundreds struck by lightning. There was the eruption of Vesuvius, when Pliny, the naturalist, was killed, and which devastated the finest portions of Italy, laying in lava and ashes Herculaneum and Pompeii. The earth is not perfectly adapted to the wants of man. It is too hot in summer and too cold in winter. I have seen whole sections parched, dried up, completely blasted by hot winds and the want of a refreshing shower. If those comprising your spirit circle control this matter they do it very poorly. Then look at the surface of the earth; millions of acres of land sterile and barren! Look around the North and South Poles,—at the arid deserts of America and Arabia,—and see how much useless material there. If spirits made this earth,—if through their instrumentality it was brought forth,—they would have used less material,—and have had it better adapted to the wants of man. I tell you your spirit circle didn't exhibit much wisdom in the construction of this earth. Look at the famines that frequently occur,—at wars, epidemics, and inundations,—all destructive to happiness and life. You say that spirits superintend the action of the elements, and you ascribe to them almost unlimited power. Better not have brought forth this world at all, better have left it a dreary waste, than to have connected therewith the evils that exist. I ascribe to those spirits incompetency,—want of skill,—and I believe them destitute of the true appreciation of man's destiny. Away with such management! What misery on all sides! Heart-rending cries are constantly heard! Licentiousness lifts its hydra head, and a pandemonium exists in the heart of all large cities.

Spirit—We are amused at your position. As long as you believed an infinite God made all things,—entertained that notion,—there was the most perfect adaptation in all things, but now as you are convinced, or partially so, that spirits did the work, you all at once commence criticising their action, and condemning their work. If a God did it, all right; if individualized intelligences did it, all wrong. Well, criticise them. It was sacrilegious to criticise a God for what he may have done, but perfectly legitimate to criticize the action of a spirit circle.

Lucretus—It really seems to me that I could have made a better earth than the one I came from. There is a vast amount of waste material there.

Spirit—The earth is not fully completed yet. Certain portions thereof are fully adapted for the abode of man, while other portions are only partially so. Great changes are being made on it. The vast bodies of water on its surface are being gradually withdrawn, and a change in the climates being made. The regions now covered with ice will be made to blossom under the care of the husbandman, and the arid deserts will be made to produce the golden grain.

Lucretus—If spirits—individualized intelligences—do these things, why are they not more expeditious in their work, and why do they work so slow?

Spirit—License to criticize is freely given you now. You dare not criticize or question the action of your God. Now you seem to see imperfections on all sides, and ascribe incompetency to those who have this matter in charge. Let me tell you, they understand their business, and there is a beautiful adaptation in all their works.

Prof. H. E. Whipple.

"Charity always covereth up a multitude of sins." "Forgive as thou wouldst be forgiven." The dissemination of slanderous articles, those that unveil some heinous offense,—are eagerly read to-day. An account of a murder, suicide, domestic difficulties, family jars, or larceny, will be read with great interest, while the narration of any event that embraces the better side of human nature, will scarcely be glanced at. This should not be the case. In the narration of events connected with the violation of law by prominent divines and those who are considered orthodox, a beautiful contrast is exhibited in favor of the adherents of the Spiritual Philosophy. At Hillsdale, Michigan, is a college, devoted to the moral and intellectual elevation of students of both sex, and occupying the chair of Literature and Belles Lettres, was Professor H. E. Whipple, the light and dark shades of whose character, are now fully realized by those who have been enjoying his fascinating and interesting society under the cloak of—"Where ignorance (of what he was doing) is bliss, 'twere folly to be wise." While his amorous proceedings were covered up by a hypocritical cloak, silvered over with smiles, and smothered with kind, gentle words, the Deacon, whose wife he seduced, was truly happy,—even while the Rev. H. E. W. was turning his family into a Pandemonium. Finally, suspicion rested upon him, and a young lady, with a lynx-eyed devotion to the right, constituted herself a detective, and secured a home at the house of the Deacon. This lady was truly devoted to morality, virtue, and religion, and her prayers were beautifully and eloquently expressed, and she hoped to be able, "through Christ," to detect some awful crime. She watched the unnoticed corners, peered into dark passages, scented the footsteps of the Professor, and finally "through a key-hole," her perseverance was rewarded, and this self-sacrificing lady, became the heroine of the town. Her discovery so affected her nerves, that she would have died had she been compelled to keep it a secret, but fortunately she was allowed to communicate her knowledge to some of her sympathizing friends, and soon the town of Hillsdale was in a wonderful commotion, which so affected the transgressor that he immediately tendered his resignation, and finally made the following confession:

DEAR FRIENDS: I can carry this load no longer. With deepest shame, and anguish unsupportable, I confess myself guilty. I felt justified in pleading not guilty, until I could contemplate the awful circumstances in which I was placed. I fondly hoped that a public revelation would be prevented, as I was assured it could be. I hoped that I might quietly change my relations, and by repentance and the practice of virtue, retain the respect of society. But the matter is rapidly breaking out, and persistent denial or confession is the only alternative.

The temptation to boldly deby is well nigh irresistible. How can I sink into the gulf of infamy which this revelation opens before me? How can I see the bitter anguish of my poor wife and children? of my dear aged mother and the whole family circle? How can I witness the indignant sorrow of confiding friends? How can I see all my opportunities for doing good depart forever? How can I see my hitherto honorable career come to so disgraceful an end?

In the insane hope that I might escape these terrible consequences, I have gone on performing official duty to keep myself up. Some of these public acts how gladly would I recall? How can my friends pardon this abuse of their confidence? I know not how far persistent denial might be successful. I know that my generous friends would rally around me and take my word against strong proof of my guilt. But I can not consent to go on compromising them thus, and drawing them to the unconscious support of falsehood and crime.

Persistent denial must cut me off from God and heaven. The only right, safe, and honorable path for me to take in these dreadful circumstances, is to confess and forsake my sin. Is there mercy for me? I can scarcely hope for it from my fellow men, although, if they could see how I suffer, their indignation would be mingled with pity. May I not hope for compassion and kindness for my ruined family? They are not to blame for the wrong of the one who was bound by every obligation to be their protector. Oh! that I could undo the wrong which I have so wickedly done! Can the blood of Christ take away my sin? Will God's children pray for me?

Who can but admire the spirit manifested in his confession. Notwithstanding this misstep, he has many noble qualities, and who can help but sympathize with him?

To Whom it may Concern, Only.

DEAR FRIEND: It is a painful task to be compelled to appeal to your integrity for the little amount which you owe the undersigned, for the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

If it was not justly due, and if he had not waited upon you for a long time, and made great sacrifices, to give you an opportunity to pay it without embarrassing you by so doing, he would not so urgently press you for it now. But he does need the money, and justice, it is not doubted, will prompt you to remit it to him in a registered letter, or by a post-office money order, taking the expense of doing so out of the amount due, which you will readily estimate from your account to be found on the yellow slip pasted on the wrapper or margin of each number of the paper.

You owe since the —— day of ——, A. D. 18—, (supply the day, month, and year from the yellow slip referred to).

The publisher will willingly continue to send you the JOURNAL on credit, on receipt of present arrearages and discount the extra fifty cents usually charged for each year's delinquency, if promptly paid on receipt of this number of the JOURNAL.

This appeal is in deep earnest to those who are one year and over in arrears for the JOURNAL, but at the same time in the spirit of kindness and fraternal regard.

S. S. JONES, Publisher and Proprietor.

"Minister of the Gospel."

Under the Constitution of the United States, to which the organic law of the several States have to conform, each, and every religious organization is the same in the eye of the law; hence, under the many reformations of the last few centuries, many sects have arisen, each in turn having received the opprobrium, sneers, and scorn of those which but a few years before had traveled the same road.

There are certain civil rights appertaining to religious organizations, of value to each. To that end, the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY was organized several years since. In its organization, an eye single was had to civil benefits upon a broad and free platform, which admits all to membership who desire it, with the privilege of withdrawal at pleasure, and holds no right to entertain or listen to complaints or charges of one member against another. Nor does the Society feel responsible for the acts or opinions of individual members. It has a constitutional proviso against creeds and all amendments that shall restrict individual rights.

Under its organic form many societies have been instituted in different States; each independent of all the others. The original Society grants letters of fellowship to all lecturers well vouched for, who apply for the same.

Samuel Smith, of Rockford, Ill, was, on the 2nd day of May, constituted a "Regular Minister of the Gospel," and authorized to solemnize marriages, in accordance with law, as binding as can be done by any minister of the gospel of other denominations.

Critical.

E. S. Wheeler, in the BANNER OF LIGHT, of May 6th, ably reviews the "Arcana of Spiritualism," and, in conclusion, speaks of Davis and Tuttle as follows:

"These divergencies of opinion and statement are fortunate, since they leave the public to reason out its own conclusions, and stimulate with original thinkers more accurate study and closer comparison. Mr. Davis has written much, and much of it needs revision. Mr. Tuttle, composing less, has been more careful, or more carefully revised, yet neither the superior condition of Mr. Davis, nor the freely confessed mediumship of Mr. Tuttle, has sufficed for the production of any revelation above criticism. We can, however, but gratefully feel that The Arcana, the last great book on Spiritualism, is its truth the best and most useful yet produced."

While he criticizes Davis and Tuttle, other fearless thinkers, no doubt, are freely criticising him, and thus each one is necessarily compelled to undergo a severe lashing from others. While he would revise Davis, Mr. Critic would revise him,—would him differently in every respect,—so he could improvise better poems, and delve deeper into the regions of philosophy.

That Brothers Davis and Tuttle have made mistakes, no one doubts, but both have accomplished a noble work that endears them to all true Spiritualists.

Out! Out!!

Notwithstanding the great number of extra copies with which we commenced Volume X., we are all out of numbers 1, 2, 3, 4, and 5, of that volume. If any of our subscribers have them, and don't care about keeping them, and will do them up in wrappers and direct them to RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, 189 Clark street, Chicago—(you need not prepay postage)—we will send them free to many who have applied for them since we were out, and in this way many will be made glad. We regret that we did not publish many more copies at the commencement of the volume, but it is a veritable truth that we are greatly surprised at the rapidly increasing demand for the JOURNAL. From every section of the country the expression is: If but one is to be left, take all other reading-matter from us, but leave the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

Spirit Artists.

Those who desire to have us publish articles in regard to their mediumistic powers, will do well to bear in mind that one means of convincing us of the truth of their profession, is to send us some of their best work, to place on exhibition in the reception-rooms of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE. When such works are presented, we put them up in nice frames, and call the attention of visitors to the same.

Hindoo New Testament.

The BHAGVAT-GEETA, the book from which our New Testament was borrowed and enlarged upon, will be ready for delivery in a few days. Let no liberal-minded person deny himself (or herself) of this book. Buy it, read it, and lend it to your church-member neighbors—Catholic and Protestant. It will be an eye-opener to them all.

Price, $1.25; postage 16 cents.

Commendation.

BROTHER JONES: Your radical paper has just come to hand, and having "looked it over," my verdict is: I admire its spirit; I like its tone; it has the right kind of a ring to it. I inclose you a card picture of "Uncle Ben."

Hoping that we may have the pleasure of meeting you again, I am

Yours respectfully,
ALBERT STEGEMAN.

Thank you, brother, for the picture, as well as for the compliment to our beloved JOURNAL. We too, admire our paper, even as a young loving mother admires her darling child.

Attention!—Who?

Certain subscribers will be astonished at the publisher's patience, if not at their own delinquency, when they carefully examine their account with this office, as published from week to week on the yellow tags to be found on the margin of the paper, or on the wrapper. Deal honestly with the newspaper publisher, even as you would be dealt by under similar circumstances.

Alden's Ready Book-Binder.

We can, without hesitation, recommend ALDEN'S READY BOOK-BINDER, as the best we have ever seen for the purposes intended. Its great convenience and very low price will certainly bring it into common if not universal use.

Testimonial.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON:—Enclosed you will find $3.00 and a lock of hair, as stated in your advertisement.

I have been troubled with excessive menstruation, attended with severe pain for about two years. Have a very weak back, headache a great deal of the time. For the past week I have been troubled with a severe pain, that commences in my left limb below the knee, and goes from there to the left side of my back. I am twenty-one years of age. Please answer immediately.

Yours in haste,
MRS. OLIVE EDMISTER.

Howard Center, Iowa, Mar. 30, 1871.

Mrs. Robinson diagnosed the case and prescribed, and here follows the patient's report one month thereafter.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON—Dear Friend:—I received your prescription, and followed the directions. I have improved a great deal since I commenced. I am gaining so fast that I do not think a second prescription necessary.

Ever your friend,
MRS. OLIVE EDMISTER.

Howard Center, Iowa, April 23, 1871.

Wisconsin Righted.

We are glad to learn, through the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, that the Legislature of Wisconsin has repealed the disgraceful statute, passed one year ago, imposing fines and imprisonment on those who healed the sick without regular diplomas from some medical faculty, or five years' practice in the State. We were really ashamed of the State whose constitution and first statutes we helped to make, when we saw its disgraceful imitation of Ohio, in attempting to prevent people from getting well without medicine, and without employing a regular physician; but we are glad to see that one year was long enough for the people to be duped by tyranny under the name of protection. A rose by any other name is said to smell as sweet; and it may be said that tyranny by any other name will oppress as unjustly.—Banner of Light.

Personal and Local.

—J. R. Francis lectures at Crosby's Music Hall each Sunday evening during the month of May—on subjects of thrilling interest.

—Mrs. Abbie Tanner will lecture in Hartford, Vt., May 7th and 21st; in Lawrence, Mass., May 28th; in Salem, Mass., the four Sundays in June.

—Messrs. Spurrier & Co., of the Spurrier House, Louisville, Ky., know how to make their guests happy.

—The gifted analytical healer, Dr. Dake, is now in Dixon, Ill., and can be consulted at the Nachusa House—will return to Chicago May 16th.

—Dr. Bailey has been lecturing at Plano, Ill. He goes to Southern Illinois and Indiana, via Ill. C. R. R. from Mendota. He can be addressed at Decatur, Ill., or at his home address, box 391, Laporte, Indiana.

—Brother E. G. Graham speaks in high terms of the healing powers of P. R. Lawrence, of Ottumwa, Iowa. He also lectures on various subjects connected with the Harmonial Philosophy.

—F. B. Dowd, the Rosicrucian, gave us a call last week, looking hale and hearty. He is a profound thinker, and a spicy writer.

—J. L. Potter makes the following report: Places visited—Winona, Minnesota City, Minneiska, Beaver, Wabasha, Reed's Landing, and Lake City. Number of lectures given—twenty-five. Amount raised in collections and dues, fifty dollars and ninety-six cents. Expenses—three dollars and fifty-five cents. Number joining association—twenty-two. At Minnesota City, a Mr. Pike challenged us to a public discussion, presenting the following as the base upon which we should rest the issue: "Does the Bible sustain the teachings of Spiritualism?" My friend worked through three evenings, using most of his time in reading the Bible, to prove there was a personal devil, self-existent, and all-powerful as God. At the close of his sixth effort, after spending most of his thirty minutes in reading his blessed Bible, he thanked the audience for their kind attention and liberal patronage, then coolly informed them that this ended the discussion, so far as he was concerned. Thus ended my first conflict. Friend Harris, of Wabasha, had urgent business at Dunleith, and could not meet his challenge, so I gave my regular lectures and passed on, ready, however, to meet any orthodox in public discussion at any time and settle this terrible question, Spiritualism. All of which is respectfully submitted to the Spiritualists of Minnesota.

Lake City, Minn.

—Mr. Willis, the spirit artist, is still taking spirit likenesses at the northwest corner of Clark and Madison streets, Chicago. He is having very good success. Our friends will do well to call upon him soon. See his advertisement in another column of the paper.

—Mrs. Juliette Yeaw will lecture in Plymouth, Mass., August 13th and 27th; in Putnam, Conn., during September.

—A touching story is told of a young sister of Alice and Phœbe Cary, whose early death was deeply lamented by her friends. A few weeks before her departure, and while she was still in health, she appeared for some minutes to be plainly visible in broad daylight, to the whole family, across a little ravine from their residence, standing on the stoop of a new house they were then building, though she was actually asleep at that moment in a bed chamber of the old house, and utterly unconscious of this "counterfeit presentment" at some distance from her bodily presence. This incident is said to have given the sisters a strong interest in the phenomena of Spiritualism.—Revolution.

—Wm. F. McLeary, post master at Baker City, Oregon, desires to know the post office address of W. P. Anderson, the spirit artist. Will some one respond, and oblige.

—A. Handell, writing from Mt. Pleasant, Iowa, says that physical mediums are in demand, and wants to know the whereabouts of Jenny Ferris. Will she furnish her address for the Medium's Register, and oblige the public.

—In this number of the JOURNAL will be found the advertisement of Dr. Entwistle, a clairvoyant physician located at 194 S. Clark street, Chicago.

—Rozy Hall writes as follows in regard to the wonderful healing powers of Dr. R. P. Fellows, of Philadelphia: "I have been blind for five years, and the last two years have not been able to see anything. On hearing of the Doctor's great success, I was induced to try him. After taking three treatments I could discern objects before me, but not clearly, and after four more treatments, I was wholly cured. Can now read sixty pages of fine print by gas light without feeling any distress from my eyes. I am a living testimonial of the doctor's wonderful skill."

—St. Louis is to be congratulated on her educational success. She has solved the school problem, so far as the Bible question is concerned, in the truly American way, by completely secularizing her education. By dropping the Bible out of the schools, she has effectually disarmed the majority of those who are opposed to our public school system, and defeated those who resorted to every possible expedient to divide the public funds among sectarian schools.

—Dr. Samuel Underhill attended the convention at Waukesha, Wis. He has lectured three times at Geneseo. He proposes to be at the Decatur Convention in June. He is an excellent developing medium, and can deliver excellent lectures on almost any subject.

—The Medium and Daybreak contains the following in reference to a seance by Horse and Williams:

"On Monday evening these mediums held a most successful seance at the Progressive Library. There were about fifteen visitors present besides the mediums, including Mr. Alsop and his two daughters. The spirit-voices were loud enough to be heard all over the house, and Yet John King could modulate his voice so as to speak gently in the ear of those he desired to communicate with. It was a dark seance, and the unlighted candle, which stood on the table, was carried about the circle, while all hands were joined, and rubbed playfully on the faces of several present. Some remarkable tests were given, showing that the spirit recognized personal events unknown to the company. A lady who was present, had not met John King since a seance at the Marshall's some years ago. On that occasion John gave this lady a peach in the dark, and he asked her on Monday night if she wanted another peach, showing that it is the same John King who used to be present at the Marshall's circle. Spirit-forms were seen by this lady, who is clairvoyant. The voice was heard sometimes in one part of the room, then another. John imitated some nautical commands, at the request of the visitors, with stentorian vigor. The most striking phenomena were produced that, any investigator could desire. A short time ago such a seance could not have been obtained either for love or money. Now the most wonderful phenomena are at the service of all who desire to avail themselves of the commanding powers. We must not omit to mention that spirit-lights were very generous and vivid. On Thursday evening last, a seance at the same place was a failure, as the circle was largely composed of temperaments unfavorable to the phenomena. This shows that the blame does not rest with the mediums when a seance is unsuccessful, and that our mediums are not tricksters, or they would not have their feelings interrupted by such unpalatable influences."

—Brother Richardson writes us that a good test medium and lecturer would do well at Iola, Kansas.

What and Where is the Spirit Land?

We have heard this question asked with a triumphant air, as if it could not be answered. It seems to us one of the simplest questions in the world. Spiritualism has been answering it more than twenty years. Wherever a spirit exists and makes a manifestation, there is the spirit world.

The last analysis of philosophy classes the universe under one of two heads,—spirit or force, and matter. Spiritualism declares that all "force or motion is will-born." Matter can not exist without spirit, neither can spirit manifest itself, except through matter. Formerly the Materialist, starting from the low standard of gross and tangible matter, stupidly supposed that the interstellar spaces were a blank, empty vacuity—void of matter—full of nothing; an absurd and inconceivable postulate.

Now, science has discovered that these interstellar spaces, illimitable in extent, are filled with an invisible, imponderable ether. That all the communications and intercourse which are continually taking place between these stellar orbs, are made by means of tremulous waves in this vast ocean of ether,—waves which may be measured and calculated with the nicest accuracy. Certain ripples in this grandest of all oceans—this vast unbounded realm of ether, speak to us in the ardent voice of heat; others give us the grand bars in the music notes of light, varied with all the gorgeous beauty of the rainbow—each shade and color of which has its fixed and determined number of waves. Since this, the grandest discovery of the ages has shed its benign light over science; no philosopher thinks or speaks of a place where there is no matter.

Here, then, in this grand illimitable ocean of ether, filling all the interstellar spaces extending beyond all finite conception, and permeating every atom and every globe, even the most dense and solid in the universe, is the spirit world!

So much for the spirit land in general. Let us look at the minutiæ, and we shall see that it varies in zones and belts and spheres, each adapted to the different conditions of spiritual development. This is a truth that inflows into the human soul, as naturally as the air does to the human body.

The first and lowest sphere, which, to its inhabitants, whether spirits out of the form, or mortals in it, and it is peopled by both, lies immediately around each earth in the deep caverns and grottoes, where foul and pestilential airs, that stifle human breath, abound, and especially around new worlds, comparatively speaking, on those on which human beings have but recently been developed, and around the older worlds, in the dens of vice and crime, where vile pollution reeks. Here, imprisoned by an inexorable law, dark and demoniac spirits in and out of the form, find themselves so blind mostly, that they do not recognize each other, and from these conditions by the law of progress, which is not entirely suspended here, they work out their salvation, and by slow degrees experience a preparation for higher conditions. Faint glimmerings of this sphere have been perceived by mortals in the past, and thus has originated the crude ideas of the fabled regions of torment.

We have said that human beings dwell in this sphere. Most persons have been there at some time, when the low and degrading passions, dark and sinister motives of selfishness that would wrong others, have mantled the soul,—they have been there, it may have been but a brief period. Others go down to these conditions very often; but while in the earthly form, influences are around them, that call them up higher, and inspire resolves to live true lives,—influences that reach the dwellers of earth more readily than they do those who have passed into the lower regions of spirit-life, leaving the body behind.

The second sphere of spirit-life is in the purer air of earth, and on the mountains,—both these spheres are accessible to mortals, as well as spirits. In the second sphere, loving human beings dwell, and all the better conditions of humanity on earth are found. All mankind live, and move, and act in one of these two spheres; and as mortals move from place to place, and change from condition to condition, they are in one of these spheres.

The spiritual influences that we receive, are either covering our spirits with the darkness of the first, or lifting them into the serene light and beauty of the second.

It is a strange infatuation to suppose that one can be doing deeds of darkness, and have a place in the sphere where truth and beauty find a home.

Mortals go from place to place, carrying with them their influences, and though some may be so dull and insensitive, as not to perceive it, it must exist and play its part in the great drama of life. The time has come when all should know this, and learn to work in and for the best conditions which they may be able to attain to. This subject of pure air, and its influence upon spirits and mortals should be better understood. Something has been known of it in all ages, and prophets and seers have ascended the mountains that they might have better spiritual conditions.

Jesus knew that it was necessary to go upon the mountain with his disciples, in order that they might receive the transfiguration.

In all our spiritual circles there should be care taken to have pure air. If we can not go to the mountain tops, let us ascend in our own houses to those places where the purest air of earth can be found, and we shall then be enabled to receive better and purer communications from our loved ones, who walk the blue ether above.

Every house should have a room properly arranged as a circle room,—well ventilated and neatly and comfortably arranged, and sacred to pure and holy communion with spirits—and in this room we should go every day, either alone or with congenial associates, and seek for this communion.

Many persons wonder why they can not see and hear spirits, and some times make the foolish remark, that they would give large sums of money if they could do these things, when the truth is, that it is not money, but pure and earnest devotion that will procure these things for us.

The second sphere of the spirit world requires pure air and harmony.

The third sphere—the children's home, is above the mountain tops in the pure blue ether, with within the atmosphere, and its influence descends to earth, wherever the proper attraction exists.

It is a law that spirits only depend from one condition to another, but they can not ascend—those who dwell in the lower spheres can not leave them at will; they are not permitted to rise and enjoy the things that dwell above them. For the purposes of love and good spirits are continually descending to those who are dwelling in darkness; but the most direct access to the lower regions of spirit life, is through earthly conditions. Human beings mostly without any consciousness of the fact, go among these lower spirits, and when their aspirations are good and true, they always carry blessings to these.

Spirits from the higher conditions find it necessary to enter into rapport with human beings, in order to reach the lowest conditions of spirit-life. Whenever mortals are prepared and impressed to work in the lowest conditions of spirit-life, they are accompanied with good and loving angels, and it is only through mortals generally, that spirits can directly influence the dwellers of the spheres of outer darkness. Of the spheres beyond the children's sphere, mortals can have but indistinct conceptions, because they can not enter these while dwelling in the mortal form, as they may the three spheres we have described.

The locality of these spheres is in the ether beyond the atmospheres of the various earths, and extending throughout the interstellar spaces.

Alignment.

In the report of the Board of Directors of the Pennsylvania Railroad, they say "the gradual improvement in the alignment of the old Philadelphia and Columbia railway, is still in progress, and will be continued until the whole line is brought to the standard of modern railroads."

This is a new form of the cry of John the Baptist, "Prepare ye the way of the Lord, and make straight his paths," and of those older prophets, who called for the bringing of "judgment to the line." We believe railroads are preparing the way of the Lord, and making straight his paths by blessing humanity.

True, it is not alone upon the rough surface of our common mother earth, that we are called upon to do these things, but in all departments of life.

Glancing over the reminiscences of the past fifty years, how many things have been done in the direction of alignment. We recall that beautiful and noble woman, Frances Wright, who spoke earnest words for freedom—not alone for her sex, but for humanity. She suffered, and was reviled and persecuted because she dared to plead from all trammels, and the right to search for truth wherever it might be found.

We also remember that brave and eloquent old man, Abner Kneeland, who was imprisoned in Boston, for a literal reading of the Bible. We heard him speak about the year 1829, to a small audience in this city, and have seldom listened to more noble and philanthropic sentiments than he presented.

He was traduced, maligned, and persecuted from breaking loose from the old theological trammels. Then came Elias Hicks, the great and good reformer among the Friends, who dared to speak freely and honestly of the convictions of his soul.

The liberal and progressive world to-day, does not realize what it owes to these noble pioneers, who have thus toiled and suffered to break down the barriers that were interposed upon the human soul by ignorance and bigotry, and that could only be removed by long continued and patient suffering, and by bold, and earnest and persistent effort to make straight the pathway of humanity. Let us press forward in this work of alignment, "till the whole line be on the true standard."

NOTICE OF MEETINGS.

Indiana State Spiritual Association.

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS OF INDIANA, GREETING!

We would announce to the friends of the Harmonial Philosophy throughout the State, and elsewhere, that the Fifth Annual Convention of the Indiana State Spiritual Association, will be held at Masonic Hall, in the city of Indianapolis, commencing Friday, June 16th, 1871, at 10½ o'clock, A. M., and will continue in session over Sunday. Each local liberal society within the State will be entitled to three delegates, and one additional delegate for each ten members over twenty, and each county where no society exists will be entitled to three delegates. The friends of the cause generally are cordially invited to be present and assist in making this convention a pleasant and profitable one.

Business of much importance is expected to be brought before the Convention.

Good speakers will be procured for the occasion. A noted test medium is expected to be present, to add to the interest of the Convention.

Half fare arrangements will be effected with the railroads as far as possible.

Good board has been arranged for at $1.00 per day for all who may attend the Convention, provided they remain three full days.

By order of the Board of Trustees.

J. R. BUEL, Secretary.

Indianapolis, Ind., April, 1871.

Mediums' and Speakers' Convention.

A Quarterly Convention of Mediums, Speakers, and others, of Western New York, will be held at Ridgeway, Orleans Co., Saturday and Sunday, May 20th and 21th, commencing at 10 o'clock each day.

The place of meeting is on the flower-embowered Ridge road, three miles north of the railroad station of Medina, from whence friends engage to convey attendants to and from the Convention. Also to entertain all who may come.

Thus, with temporal needs supplied, amid an atmosphere attuned to harmony and perfumed by flowers, and overshadowed by the bending heavens, aglow with angel ministrations, may we not anticipate a glorious re-union? A cordial invitation to attend is extended to all truth-seekers.

PROF. HOWE'S
SEVEN-HOUR SYSTEM of GRAMMAR.

The writer of this useful book has had a practical experience in the art of teaching of upwards of thirty years. He had long been impressed that a shorter pathway to grammar than that which led through the perplexing subtleties of the text books could be secured, and with much skill devised his "Seven-Hour system" of oral teaching. Appeals from his audiences and requests from correspondents abroad became so numerous and repeated, that he was compelled to put his ideas into print to satisfy the public demand. His discoveries in the science are many and startling, reducing the labor, in many instances, from years to minutes. The limited governing power of the Transitive Verb from 50,000 words to seven; his rotating or vibrating "S," securing syntactical agreement between the Verb and Noun; his exposition of the Subjunctive Mood and Preposition, with many other interesting features of the work, are not only original, but might with very great propriety be considered inspirational. These are of the utmost value to the public writer, the platform speaker, the clergyman, or the senator. Fifteen minutes attention to any one of them will protect any intelligent person from erring once in a lifetime!

The work is got up in pamphlet form of about 50 pages, strong and neat covers, with large plain type, containing everything within, in its simplest essence, to constitute the Practical Grammarian. It is not sold for the value of the paper, print, or binding, but for the Seven-Hour grammatical education contained within.

CLAIRVOYANT PHYSICIAN.

No. 194 South Clark Street, Room 3, Chicago.

He is prepared to treat any of the many forms of disease, and possesses a peculiar insight into the cause and character, and a controlling power over it which seems wonderful (even to himself). His medicines are purely vegetable. Invalids at any distance will be as thoroughly examined, and the means of cure (if curable) as definitely pointed out as if they were present, by sending a lock of hair, giving name, age, sex, and two leading symptoms of the disease. Insanity and fits not treated. Examination fee, by hair, $2.00.

MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD,
Healing Medium,

Has been before the public as a successful Healer the past fifteen years. We rely entirely on the controlling influences. We diagnose and give prescriptions by letter. Distance no objection. Will visit in person's reasonable distance those that desire, and pay all the expenses. Delineation and advice in a variety of ways. Emblems we give gratuitously to all our patients, when presented by our guides. Our forme system has been to come en rapport with the applicant by the hand-writing or lock of hair; but to save time, and the unpleasant sensation of taking on the symptoms of the disease, we require the applicant to give age and sex, with one or two leading symptoms of the disease, written by the patient, if able to write—if not, send lock of hair. As the giving of tests is not the object which we seek, but to restore the patient to health by the Nature's own hand, in the quickest time possible, we do not deem it necessary here to lumber up an advertisement with what we have done or what we can do, but prefer to be known by our fruits.

Terms, for diagnosis and prescription, $3; Diagnosis without prescription, $1; all subsequent prescriptions, $1 each. All letters should be accompanied with the fee, and addressed to MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD, Box 45, Lake Mills, Jefferson Co., Wis.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,
Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium,
148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

MRS. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief, in curable cases, through the POSITIVE and NEGATIVE forces latent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

MRS. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done so well when the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric test, business and trance medium.

Terms:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $3.00; each subsequent, $2.00: Psychometric Delineation of Character, $2; answering Business Letters, $3. The money should accompany the application. to insure a reply.

WISCONSIN.

Southern Spiritual Association.

The Southern Wisconsin Spiritual Association met at Waukesha, Wisconsin, on Saturday, April 8th, 1871, and opened its morning session at 10:30 A. M. President B. P. Balcom in the chair.

Bro. E. W. Stevens, on call, read the report of the last Association. The usual Committees were appointed. Mrs. Nettie C. Tator, of Milwaukee, was appointed Secretary, in place of Mrs. Dodge, whose resignation was accepted, and E. W. Stevens as Corresponding Secretary.

Meeting adjourned until 2 o'clock, P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Association met and called to order by the President.

Music by the choir.

Conference opened with a speech by Dr. Samuel Underhill, in which he showed the different causes of Infidelity, and the inability of the churches to meet the demand of the reasoning mind. He showed them equally unable to satisfy the scientific investigator, and illustrated it by the proverbial infidelity of physicians. He taught that the sources of truth were in actual experience through the knowledge of facts, and through intuition, with reason as the balance in which the discoveries were to be weighed, and as a separator of the chaff from the wheat; that the churches had about as much satisfaction for the mind thinker as the imagination of a field of corn that was planted and grew ten years ago, would be to those of to day. His remarks were very racy, to the point, and elicited much mirth and good feeling.

He was followed by Frances A. Logan, whose remarks were affecting, referring to her early experience in religion and Spiritualism, in this, her native town, with kindness.

Mrs. Andrews, although too delicate to give a lecture, spoke a few words of kindly greeting to the Association.

The whole tone of this meeting, was that of the kindest, fraternal feeling, joy at meeting each other to exchange notes of experience since the last meeting, realizing that the reunions were great sources of strength, sympathy, and encouragement to those whose missions were to go out alone, to battle prejudice, superstition and ignorance. God grant that these meetings may be frequent, for they are like bread to the hungry, and Heaven-distilling dew to the drooping flower.

SATURDAY EVENING SESSION.

Conference opened by A. B. Severance, followed by S. H. Todd, Dr. Sullman Severance, E. W. Stevens, Dr. Underhill, and others.—Subject: Magnetic Laws.

This conference was very interesting and practical. All seemed to be impressed with the necessity for more thorough knowledge of the spiritual laws, that are in every way demanding attention with the increase of refining influences,—such as mediumship, refinement, and spiritualization that are peculiar to this age. All concurred in the belief that physical purity was eminently necessary to spiritual purity, and that every person, even though he uttered not a word, through his magnetic atmosphere, either elevated or degraded those whom he came in contact with; that even if a person did not participate in the insane pleasures of the saloon or gambling den, that the magnetism that he might absorb if negative, while in such places, had its degrading and poisoning effects.

After the conference, Lois Walsbroker took the stand, and delivered the regular lecture of the evening. Subject, "God Manifest in the Flesh Necessary to the Salvation of Humanity," taking ground that those elements and principles which we recognize as immortal in the Divine Fountain, must be manifest through the race, instead of one man,—Jesus; must be a universal, in place of an especial manifestation for salvation; also, that salvation was to be from present instead of future hells. Saviors of the past, as of the present, came as the results of the unfolding, perhaps unconscious needs of the race at that particular period. Salvation in the next state of existence, must come through God manifest in the spirit. The manifestation of God in the flesh, comes through sacrifice, suffering, by love being crucified by ignorance to rise in higher forms of wisdom. The drunkard, the libertine, the outcast, are a part of the price paid by the race for the wisdom which must come, ere we can remove the causes which bring such hells,—and they are as much a part of the great sacrifice as was Jesus. The problem must be finally solved through an application of the laws of maternity, woman having the power, through the ballot-box, and otherwise, to make proper conditions for her highest work, the seed of the woman shall indeed bruise the serpent's head.

SUNDAY MORNING SESSION.

Opened with a conference.

Mrs. Nettie C. Tator made a few practical remarks in reference to the objects of conventions. She thought that it was eminently proper, just and pleasant, that the opening sessions should be for kindly, fraternal greeting, and the interchange of ideas and opinions, but, she hoped ere the Association adjourned, we not only would have had a good time, found what each other thought, but would have done something to help put our ideas into practical working order to form better plans for co-operation in the good work, and above all, to help us to individual growth and action for the salvation of our own souls, as well as those of our neighbors.

The conference was followed by a lecture from Mrs. Dr. Severance, one of the most practical and pungent lecturers of the Convention. She spoke of the refinement of matter through the mineral, vegetable, and animal kingdoms, preparatory to its entering into the composition of the human form. She claimed that matter did not cease refining here, but through healthy, physical action, spirit matter was produced, each physical particle eliminating a corresponding particle of refined materiality to compose the spirit-body.

She showed the imperative importance of having a pure, healthy physical form, free from the ruining effects of alcohol, tobacco and poisonous drugs, that the spirit-body might have a corresponding healthfulness and purity,—as it must be similar to the source that provided it.

She then went on to show the progress of religious ideas, and likened the progress to the growth of a child. First, the selfish faculties, which cared simply for the acquiring of selfish indulgences, which brought forth the doctrine of "an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth." Then the next faculties in the order of development in the child's mind, were the ideal, reverential, and sympathetic, and, as the child at that period needed the offices of a teacher to instruct it in a more advanced manner, so of the race, and the Bible did not end here, for as the teacher was regarded as absolute authority to the child, so the priest had been received by the unthinking masses.

The last faculties developed in the child, were the reasoning, which would not be satisfied with authority, but demanded demonstrations. Thus it was with the race, and to meet this demand, came Spiritualism,—not only with its principles, but with its proofs.

One of the great results of this age of reason, was the development of individuality in thought and action, which gave all the right to live their own lives, and think their own thoughts, and this demanded not only charity in theory, but in practice. An unchristable Spiritualist, was a misnomer. She exhorted Spiritualists to look well to their own improvement individually, and cater less to public opinion, but to command respect by our lives, instead of running after it.

SUNDAY AFTERNOON SESSION.

Meeting called to order at 2 o'clock, P. M.

Music by the choir.

A short conference was held, after which, Bro. J. O. Barrett, State Missionary, gave a very interesting report of Missionary work in the State. He is an earnest, active worker in the field, but we are fearful that the Spiritualists of the State, are as yet, hardly awake to the importance of this work. To us it seemed the most important work taken into consideration during the Convention. This report was followed by his giving a lecture,—subject, "The Spiritual Body." All is life. Death is but transient. Every action is a circle. All action is by one universal law. All blessings are from above. The soul and the spirit are principles, masculine and feminine. Soul the maternal, spirit the paternal, outer body the offspring. We go in and out, and so long as the tie is held, the spirit may roam in the heavens above and the earth beneath, and still return to the body, etc.

Recess of ten minutes.

Song by Mrs. Carrie B. Wright.

Lecture by Mrs. Mattie Perry (formerly Mattie Hewitt), preceded by the Lord's Prayer,—subject, "The progress of Religious Ideas."

We wish we had the time and space to give a report of this lecture. We can only say that the audience listened with breathless attention, and that Mrs. Parry's power as a lecturer, has increased with her womanhood.

Adjourned.

SUNDAY EVENING SESSION.

Conference for a short time.

Singing by the choir, after which, Bro. Stevens gave the regular lecture of the evening—subject, "What is Man?" We were so interested in this lecture, that we gave ourself up to the pleasure of listening, instead of making a report of it. Suffice it to say, that it was exceedingly interesting, and was delivered with great power and patnos. Brother Stevens is one of our most interesting and earnest lecturers, and is doing a good work in this field of labor.

After this lecture, Sister Walsbroker made some earnest and practical remarks. She spoke with a power that showed the tides of inspiration from above were on the side of wisdom and justice.

The evening session then closed by Sister Logan delivering an interesting poem with great effect. We welcome her back to our State as a very useful co-worker.

During the intermission, a very interesting letter from Dr. H. S. Brown, of Milwaukee, was read, calling attention to the Speaker's Mass Convention, to be held at Decatur, Illinois, June 2nd, 3d and 4th, 1871.

The following Resolutions were adopted at the last session:

WHEREAS, "The agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom," and spiritual thought, and its kindred measures, is the first great need in the pathway mind to endow Institutional Reforms; therefore,

Resolved, That a State Committee be appointed by this Convention, whose duties it shall be to visit and inspect our State Industrial Reform School, the State Prison, the Insane Asylum, and the Asylums for the Deaf Mutes, and the Blind, and report their observations, suggesting radical improvements where needed for the benefit of the unfortunates; and that the questions of Pardonings, Prostitution, Idleness, etc., be submitted to their judicious attention, reporting their doings through the spiritual and secular press.

Resolved, That we, as Spiritualists, exercise toward all, the charity we profess, our criticism being, not for condemnation, but for the development of the good, and that mediums for the different manifestations share our sympathies and encouragement, last, peradventure, we be found in opposition to the angel world. It is far better to be deceived an hundred times, than to judge an innocent person wrongfully.

Resolved, That the belief in the medicinal uses of alcohol, lie at the foundation of Intemperance.

Resolved, That healing the sick by magnetic treatment, is one of the most important sciences of the present day, and is worthy of the most earnest attention, and the closest investigation of its laws. Therefore, we recommend co-operation among magnetic physicians, either in calling special meetings for an interchange of experiences and ideas upon this science, or the organizing of an Institute, for instruction in reference to magnetic laws.

Resolved, That we cultivate the spirit of charity toward all people, all religions, and toward each other, regarding the virtues of life, as the tests of the truths we profess.

Resolved, That this Convention tender their sincere thanks to the liberal people of Waukesha, for their kindness and generosity in caring for our temporal wants during our stay among them.

NEW YORK.

Missionary Report.

Losing three appointments the week preceding Christmas on account of the obstruction of roads by snow, we reached Friendship the 24th, of December, in time to attend the two days meeting at that place. Advertising in the county papers proved an insufficient means of extending to our friends notice of the meeting, and but few heard of it even in Friendship, and in numbers the meeting was not much of a success; but the interest was good and well sustained, and the expression was general that we had a profitable time. There is but one family of Spiritualists in that place, and but few in the vicinity. Bro. Baker, of corning, was present, and added much to the interest of the occasion. He spoke with us in Wirt, the following evening at the house of Bro. Sherman, with good acceptance, and we hope he will find encouragement to make lecturing his exclusive business. It was said there was one hundred and ten of Bro. Sherman's neighbors present at his house, though but a few hours notice had been given of the meeting, and the earnest attention, absorbing interest, and manifest sympathy with the sentiments uttered, witnessed on this occasion, was gratifying.

His interest is wide-spread and eager. What of Spiritualism? is the all-absorbing topic of the day, and those whose timidity has counseled the introduction of the subject under another name, and in a diluted form, in places not previously favored with its discussion, may dismiss their fears, for it is unquestionable, that in nearly all places, no other subject for a lecture draws so well, and this interest is not for a day, but for all days. People don't know where they belong; are doubtful of what they may believe, and know best of all what they do not believe. They have largely out-grown the old, and feel that they have little sympathy with the dogmas of the past, and are, as it were, groping in the dark, and reaching out for more light, and firmer ground, and in the first meager statement of the principles of Spiritualism, they ever's a gleam of hope and anxiously desire the fuller elucidation of the subject. Bitter opposers listen with an interest ill concealed, and henceforth abate much of their bitter zeal, if they do not, as they often do, upon hearing a single lecture, become candid inquirers, or it may be, open and hearty friends. At one place a noble old lady, who listened for the first time to the utterances of the doctrines of a liberal faith, was overcome by her emotions, and wept with very joy, as she was made to feel that she might safely without reserve indulge life-long convictions, which she never heard stated before, and which she almost feared to believe against the protest as she thought of the world.

It is the constantly recurring evidence to the fact of the ready acceptance to counsel of our philosophy, and the joy with which it is received, that affords so much encouragement to the pioneer worker, and stimulates to further exertions and sacrifices. And this is still of no less importance than hitherto. It is hard for people to wholly give up the old, loosely as they may grasp it, until they see distinctively and in bold outline, something better, and truer to which to attach themselves. Hence there is not only a good deal of prejudice still existing against Spiritualism, and great ignorance of its teachings, but in consequence of this ignorance, there is yet much of superstition, much of half belief in church dogmas concerning the Divinity of the Bible, the existence of a personal Devil and in an eternity of woe, but this is only a half belief, and is unsubstantial as a shadow, and waits but the clear, positive statement of a better faith, to disappear forever. The light of the present thrown upon these fading superstitions, dooms them from that very hour. The mine is prepared, and the train is laid, and all that is wanting is the lighted match. All the ages of the past have been fitting us for that ripening hour.

During the ten weeks we were absent, we traveled over six hundred miles, and had varied experiences of roads and weather, but missed no appointment, save those named, and we found an audience awaiting us on every occasion,—however stormy the night. We held meetings in Erie, Allegany, Cattaraugus and Steuben Counties, in the following named places,—viz: Friendship, Wirt, Cuba, Farmersville, Rushford, Caseville, Almond, Hornellsville, Dansville, Sublinia, Yorkshire, Springville, Ashford, Bastotio, Eldyville, Ellicottville, Oramel, Glenwood and Marilla. At those places the meetings were held at private houses, and at two of these, few were present, but generally the meetings were well attended, and sometimes the houses were crowded. At many places we spoke but once; at others two, three and four times, and the increase of interest made manifest the important use of giving courses of lectures when possible.

We are indebted as follows for donations to the Missionary fund: To Bro. Sherman and Lott, of Friendship, $15; Mrs. R. N. Miller, Caseville, .50; Mrs. Maria M. Newton, Dansville, $6; Mr. Jechman, Arcade, $1; Mr. Daley, Yorkshire, $1; Luther Cummings, Yorkshire, .50; Mr. Piggart, Springville, $1; Mr. Gaylord, Springville $1; Nicholas Cook, Ashford, $1; J. D. Larribee, Ashford, $1; Clark Burchard, E. Otto, $2; Mrs. John Lang, $2; Oscar Beach, $1; a Friend $6; William H. Eddy, Eddyville, $1; Harry Foot, Glenwood, $1; Mr. Clark, $1;

At many places we received nothing whatever, no collections being taken, as we were averse to doing so when no previous lectures had been given, and the audience were mainly opposers of Spiritualism.

Everywhere we were cordially greeted by old and new friends, and for their hospitality and many favors, they have our warmest thanks.

In conclusion we would urge the importance of placing in the hands of the State Board a fund, with which to buy tracts. We could have distributed a thousand in the past winter, and thus been the means of continuing the work after we had gone, and making it more permanent and fruitful. We felt the importance of this at every gathering, and hope the modicum of money needed to meet this pressing want may be supplied at once.

THE DOCTRINE OF ATONEMENT.

A Discourse on Atonement, delivered in the Methodist Church (New Hope), in Montgomery Co., Va., April 2nd, by Rev. J. M. Barnes, of Snowville, Va.

Our subject to-day is the Doctrine of Atonement, or Forgiveness of Sins.

Did Jesus teach the doctrine that a man, guilty of evil doing can be forgiven, and afterward, be as good, pure, and happy, as though he had never been guilty of evil deeds?

Secondly, is the doctrine of atonement or forgiveness of sins, a sentiment of justice and right?

Can a God that will permit a single sinner to escape without punishment, be a God of justice?

Can a God that does not reward man for every good deed, be a God of justice and right? Can a God that will punish the innocent, or allow the innocent to suffer for the guilty, be a righteous God?

Thirdly and lastly; what is the effect of the doctrine of atonement upon sinners?

1st. Did Jesus teach forgiveness, as we understand forgiveness to-day? I answer, No.—Matt. 25th: 14th to 30th inclusive.

The talents given, and the reward for the use—and only for the use, the condemnation for neglect of duty, and for that alone, we learn that every one got their just reward, and no more. Again, his declaration. By the deeds done in the body, whether they be good, or whether they be evil, shall ye be judged—and 25:1 will read the four gospels, and find such to be the general tenor of the teachings of Jesus, as we have them by the writers and translators to us, (such as they were.)

But, says the objector, read Matt. 9th: 1st to 6th verses. There he says, Thy sins are forgiven thee. Yes, thy diseases are cured. The forgiveness of sins and the curing of diseases are the same thing, and I affirm, that no rational person can make aught else, out of that passage.

Again, Luke 7th: 36th to 50th verses. He says to the woman, Thy sins are forgiven thee. (Yes, read the last clause), thy faith hath made thee whole. She, by her simple faith, saved herself; it was not Jesus, nor any power, other than herself. Like mesmerism or somnambulism, the faith of the patient, or the faith of the operator, acting in union with the will and faith of the patient, cures the disease, and enables the patient to see, reveal, and do what would otherwise be utterly impossible.

2nd. Is it just to forgive a sinner, and let him escape the just punishment of his sins? What would be the condition of things, if no law regulated the movement of the earth and all the worlds of matter? There would be no calculating with any certainty of the ebb and flow of the tides; no reckoning about day and night, or seed-time and harvest. What confusion and despair would be all around and about us. What would be our own condition, could we exist in such confusion? No, I think not. If law and order are so essential to the physical world, are they not equally so in the moral and religious world? What a God is this, who takes no notice of the violators of his law, or if he does accept an offering (as under Judaism), permits us to palm off our sins upon the head of a goat, or as we Christians have been aiming to do upon Jesus. Is it just for Jesus to bear our sins for us, or for us to palm them off upon him?

Is it just for God to accept Jesus or any one else, in the stead of the guilty one himself? I answer, No. Can I be happy in a heaven where I am not being, where I have no right—in the presence of those for whom I have no affiliation? No, let me go where I justly belong—let that place be wherever it may.

Lastly. What has been the effect of the doctrine of atonement or forgiveness, upon the lawless, the animal, the selfish, and upon all the hardened wretches, we meet? They are all, or most of them, firm believers in previous atonement; they say they mean to repent, and be forgiven of their sins, and thus come out all right in the end.

The worst of murderers, thieves, and criminals of all grades I have ever met, were believers in our Holy Bible. They believe it teaches the doctrine of atonement or forgiveness of sins, through the blood of Jesus.

What greater license to commit sin can be given? Do the Catholic priests sell indulgences so cheap? Did they in Martin Luther's day? No. And what a fabrication is this, to palm it off as a gospel that Jesus preached, or a doctrine he ever taught.

OTHER CHIPS.

GREETING.

Again I congratulate the RELIGIO PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL and its numerous readers upon the evidences, not only of the general healthy progress of the grand cause of Spiritualism, but also that of the JOURNAL, as an organ and fearlessly bold vindicator of that cause and its numerous apostles, the good JOURNAL itself. Among the many evidences of that fact upon the part of the JOURNAL, I am glad to see "lines of vigorous thought" always concisely and elegantly expressed from the pen of that bold and logical writer, Hudson Tuttle. Also radiant sunbeams of soul-emotions, "wreathed in smiles," emanating from the genial fountains of human love, happily bubbling up in the great heart of his "better half," Emma.

Bundles of golden grain thou art binding up, oh, JOURNAL, of liberalism and toleration. Go on thy way, "conquering and to conquer." Be ever faithful to the motto of thy manhood, and "nothing shall prevent thy onward march."

GENERAL PROGRESS.

During my last winter's tour in the states of New York and Pennsylvania, I realized the fact, more fully than heretofore, that our cause is steadily though often silently gaining ground. The great tidal wave of spiritual enthusiasm having spent itself in the natural reaction from its sweeping flow, of the first few years of modern spiritualism, the more gentle and lasting work by gradually and nearly deposited layer, the finer alluvial sediment of the rich and prolific soils of truth which the sweeping tides of the early floods drifted from their former beds. And this sediment is not only pregnant with fertilizing elements, but also with vital forces of spontaneous development. Hence, healthy growth and nutritious fruitage results; as well, also, new ideas and enlarged understanding of the laws, modes, means, sources and purposes—the divine medication and ultimates of this angel-ushered movement.

LOCAL AND PERSONAL.

Corry, Pa., where the waters of Spiritualism had only been irregularly and semi-occasionally agitated for a few years previous, in February last seemed to be flooded with "agents of the work." The efforts of the workers and mediums were concentrated at that point within the space of some six week's time, in February and March. Among them, Rev. Moses Hull, Lyman C. Howe, Mrs. Robbins, of Watkins, N. Y.; Mrs. Trego, of Pallstead, Pa., and myself. We all met myself. It would seem that design had thus localized these elements.

A Unitarian professor from the Meadville, Pa., Theological Institute, has started a movement at Corry, with a view of organizing a church or society. Spiritualists supported the movement, with the understanding that the "Liberalists," so called, would assist the Spiritualists in turn, to provide for their meetings. So far as I was able to judge, those liberalists were "weighed in the balance and found wanting." My advice to Spiritualists everywhere would be, organize your own forces; concentrate your own means; take care of your own. All there so-called liberalists will fall you when put to the test.

A lady of Corry, Mrs. Moore, a Christian Spiritualist, and a member of the Campbellite or Christian church there, was advertised and announced by the minister thereof to deliver a lecture in said church. After the announcement, and a few days before the appointed time, a church meeting was held, wherein it was decided that the lady could not use the church for lecturing, the reason assigned, being that she visited with and harbored Spiritualists.

I took occasion to ventilate this matter in one of my meetings, and hoped that Mrs. Moore would be invited to deliver her lecture in that hall. She was proffered the free use of the hall, and delivered her address, which I was informed, was well received.

Corry has some whole souled Spiritualists, and a few good resident media. Mrs. Julietta M Manley, a writing medium, is doing a grand good work. She is literally a "lamp of light" in the midst of darkness into light. I received through her writing beautiful and pointed evidences, of superior order, of her mediumship. She is an intelligent and cultivated lady, the wife of E. G. Manley, an active worker in our cause. Mrs. M. M. Arnold is a good healer, and doing a good missionary work. Mrs. Griffith is an excellent clairvoyant doctress, etc. A. Follett and family placed us under lasting obligations. Mr. Hunt, the "old wheelhorse" of Spiritualism in Corry, is a noble specimen of manhood. I am grateful to all the friends in Corry, as in many other places, for many kindnesses.

At Columbus, Pa., four miles distant from Corry, is a fine society of Free Thinkers, composed of Universalists, Spiritualists and "outsiders." They have a fine church edifice for meetings, and turn out large and highly intellectual audiences. What is also important to the itinerant, they put "large-sized stamps" into the "contribution basket!"

At Pottsville and Wrightsville, Pa., two and a half miles apart, are a few whole souled friends of our cause. Judge J. Tott and wife are noble examples, as also Daniel Tott and family. The Wrights—the good man, Judge Wright, passed on to the higher life while I was in that vicinity. Messengers, Stowell and others are among the faithful. Mrs. S. M. Stowell is a good clairvoyant healer, and an excellent woman. Reassuming and unappreciated, she is struggling against adverse circumstances. She will find a "golden crown" some day.

But I dislike to write "locals" or "personals." The field is so broad; there are so many individual interests, all deserving mention, one is so liable to slip over, do injustice. Justice can not always be done without saying harsh things, and there is so great a liability to erroneous discrimination that one needs be a bold, or unscrupulous adventurer, or an egotistical vampire who ventures upon this alternately calm and stormy sea. Favoritism I detest, and yet my constant inclination is toward the weak and neglected, the humble, but generally most deserving—retiring souls. Hence, I generally keep out of those waters. Especially do I dislike to canvass matters pertaining to self. This unwelcome duty, however, is sometimes forced upon us; nearly always, too, in the realm of the unpleasant side. Thus it becomes my painful duty to say a few words by way of WARNING.

In different parts of the country I meet with conditions which suggest to my sensitive nature the surroundings of the north pole, or a "wet blanket wrap," in winter. Being by nature a persistent investigator, as well as psychometer, I "search after," not exactly God, but the "coal in the meal tub." Pretty "good on chase," I usually "hole a fox." Some individual or individuals inspired with either personal hatred, jealousy, malice, or, perhaps, an extreme "love for the cause," and desire to "protect the innocent,"—what assumption!—have put about certain reports and statements in regard to my conduct and character in the past, which are utterly false and devilishly vindictive. No doubt some credulous publishers have honestly peddled these reports, ridiculously absurd as, in some cases, they have become—like the story of an afflicted mortal who was said to have "vomited three crows." But the chief dispenser of these lies and vastness knows he lies when he utters them. But perhaps no better fruit could be expected from so corrupt a tree. The rotten-hearted corruption which courses and pulsates through the veins of that form of outward fairness and symmetry, coated as it is with the deceptive sugar of hypocrisy—needs exposure to the broad sunlight of human consciousness and justice. And I hereby warn not only the corrupt originators of these stories, but also those malicious satellites, who, full of corruption, ever dance attendance upon the corruption of their system, that I am steadily gathering facts of their personal histories. If that kind of warfare is desired by them, as a dernier resort, and in obedience to the law of self protection, I will unfold what that system upon one common hole. He who robs me of my good name, shall find that "trifle" shall be a captain, as well as just, law of God and nature.

I dislike such a work, but there are many unpleasant duties which must not be shirked.

We are told that "all calumnies will die out." So they will, after one has died out of earth-life and earth remembrance. It is next to impossible to overcome the wide spread prejudice, or the effect of a scandal. Every villain well know this, and hence keep this weapon ever in hand. But, thank nature, there is retribution. And, sooner or later, it shall come home to the door of the transgressor. "Let us have peace." We can have peace when justice is done—never before!

ANNUNCIATORY.

Again in the West. Spoke at Plano, Illinois, on Wednesday and Thursday evenings, 19th and 20th and on Sunday, the 23rd inst. Was confronted, considering the weather, with fair audiences; five elders of the Latter Day Saints' Church. These people I find earnest, liberal, and willing to listen, and openly criticise and discuss differences of opinion, and the evidences on which such are based.

The Methodist minister here, also attended one lecture.

From Mendota, Ill., I expect to take the Ill. C. R. R. route to Southern Illinois and Indiana. May be addressed at Decatur, Ill., or to home address, box 294, La Porte, Ind.

MINNESOTA.

Letter from Mary Gideon.

DEAR JOURNAL:—Your paper comes to us like the first breath of early spring, cheering us with many soul-inspiring thoughts and truths, and my heart is filled with joy and gratitude, that we are blessed with a few, at least, such stern advocates of truth—papers whose columns are free, open to the convictions of truth, to the poor and oppressed, a friend ever ready to redress their wrongs. Never have such papers been more needed than at the present time, and cannot be too highly appreciated. The laurels of victory will yet rest upon the heads of those editors who remain firm, in calm or storm, upon the glorious basis of freedom and truth.

In what age or clime was there ever more to awaken thought, to inspire the truth-loving soul, and to arouse all lovers of humanity to greater enthusiasm in every good cause? This is no time to be spent in song; but loudly it calls for wide-awake thought and action. Spiritualism has made many deep inroads into theology; but a hard battle is before us yet to fight, ere we have won the victory. The clouds of a coming storm are already visible; we see them in the recent attempts to fine and imprison mediums in Chicago and other places; and the spirit of hostility manifested every where in our country. Spiritualists! friends of truth! awake. Mark the signs of the times. Gird on your armor and be strong.

Ye that slumber, slumber no longer. Heaven and her good angels do not prophesy falsely. To many they have given a glimpse of the future. Many facts, long ago revealed by spirits, as sometime to be enacted are beginning to be realized. These immortal monitors should be heeded, their warnings are not given for naught. And as they bid us speak, let us speak; withhold not a single truth, lest those faithful workers we would be cast aside, and "even that which we have be taken away from us."

Everywhere virtue and vice is becoming more positive. The enemies to progress and human rights becoming bolder in their denunciations of right. And the true and good so boldly speak in defense of right. Orthodoxy has received its death-blow and its so-called supporters feel that it is so—the growing uneasiness in the ranks of theology is plainly to be seen. But their persecutions are no disadvantage to our cause, they are rather a help—serving to arouse the inactive to feel the importance, duty and necessity of action—of keeping on the alert, ready to meet and contend with its foes; stimulating and inspiring the vigilant in their efforts to sustain and help forward the cause. But, friends, persecutions and outrages must not be passed idly by. We must redress them when we can. Expose the hypocrisy, deception and fraud carried on under the cloak of religion and for "Christs sake." For "Christ's sake" they would cast a poor brother in prison,—would delight in putting him to death, simply for having communion with spirits; and priests and prelates will take the last hard earned penny of the poor, all for Christ's sake and the glory of God. Yet these sanctimonious divines—leeches of humanity—charge our mediums with deceiving and defrauding the people for money! Friend orthodox, "first cast the beam out of thine own eye, and then thou shalt see clearly to cast the mote out of thy brother's eye."

"Don't have anything to do with the Spiritualists and mediums, they are dangerous beings—in league with the devil," is the stand still Christians cry. Inspired and guided by the holy truths of God, yet how fearful of contamination they are! To avoid us everywhere, is the general cry; and lecturers are proposed to, as decade are usually quickly avoided, as all other plain, honest means of attack is shunned; but cowardly seek every opportunity for doing a sly injury. When they do accept a challenge to debate or invitation to speak in their own defense, bare assertions and unfounded falsehoods are most often the main weapons they wield,—not clear, forcible arguments.

Though the storm of contention is daily growing hotter, and to many the aspect of the times appears threatening—we need only be firm and true to our standard of truth and liberty;—the darkness of sin and bigotry will yet be dispelled; and the sunshine of peace and love will yet shed their beams upon the earth, as purely and radiantly as they shine in heaven—true harmony reign over our new, restless, contending world.

ARCANA OF SPIRITUALISM.

A MANUAL OF
SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY
By Hudson Tuttle.

WITH PORTRAIT OF THE AUTHOR. PRICE $2.00; Postage 24c.

This work embodies the results of the author's researches and experience during the past twenty years, and is, without doubt, the most thorough presentation of the subject of Modern Spiritualism before the public.

Dealing, as it does, with a question in which the interest of all mankind is centered, it cannot fail to command universal attention.

While the experience of thousands will repudiate some of the conclusions the author arrives at, they will still be able to obtain much invaluable information from the book. "It is a book to place in the hands of every person who would know more of what it is that is waking the world to new hopes and aspirations, and planting a tree of life beside every man's door.

BY.....E. V. WILSON

Discussion Between E. V. Wilson and Rev. Clark Braden.

[Notes taken during a Discussion on the Resolution,—"Resolved, That Modern Spiritualism is worthy of the support and confidence of the people."

E. V. WILSON affirms.—REV. CLARK BRADEN denies.

(Concluded.)

We Sum the 16th and 17th up as Follows:

Mr. Braden first, says, are there mesmeric phenomena outside of Spiritualism? If not, I ask, what belongs to Spiritualism? and is Spiritualism superior to mesmerism?

I know a medium who saw and described the spirit of one Clark, and received long communications from his spirit and sent them to the father, and they were believed. By and by here comes Clark from the South, full two hundred pounds of flesh and blood, in good health and spirits.

2nd.—In 1820 Leroy Sunderland and Mary Mattock excelled in wonderful phenomena under the head of mesmerism—all that modern Spiritualism has done. My friend's statement about the little girl weighing twenty seven pounds moving two hundred and seventy five pounds, without contact. We ask how do you know that a disembodied spirit moved the weight? Why not the spirit in the body of the little girl do it?

Why go outside of the embodied spirit for the power? Who shall limit the power of the spirit in the body? Do disembodied spirits do these things?

3rd.—Any affidavit or newspaper report introduced by my friend in this discussion amounts to nothing unless I have the opportunity of cross-examination.

The Davesports advertised in Des Moines, Iowa, one night as jugglers, and the next night as Spiritualists. Hence, it is reasonable to infer that they were jugglers all the time.

When I detect a fraud in a principle, I am warranted in shunning all connected with that principle.

McQueen, Van Vleck and Leland, once shining lights in Spiritualism, conceded they were liars. Why not all the rest of their mediums, seers and healers liars and deceivers?

The woman in this hall the other evening saw Jesus in the cradle, saw him a boy, saw him on the cross, saw his disembodied spirit. Mr. Wilson says she was insane. I say it.

In White County, at Burnt Prairie, during a camp meeting revival, the converts treed Jesus, run him up a tree, and one good brother went up after him. If these meetings of the Methodists insane, why not the parallel in Spiritualism make the Spiritualist insane?

I heard a man say that he lay down on a light feather bed, and that his weight made no impression on the bed, left no depression. Mr. Wilson does not believe it, nor do I. Why believe these other stories told us by the Spiritualists?

The Jerkers of Kentucky and Indiana a few years ago treed the devil, and some of them actually stood at the foot of the tree and barked at him—playing the dog.

All of these things Mr. Wilson would laugh at, and tell them to their face that they were insane; why not call Dr. Newcomer, Mr. Eddy and Mr. Wilson insane?

4th.—You can't scare me—I am not a bit frightened, and shall tell you just what I please. You will understand that. Has the committee of Intellectiance declared the phenomena to be produced by spirits? When they do so, I am ready to accept of Spiritualism.

The Harrisburg picture proves only the picture—not that spirits painted it.

I have witnessed my friend Wilson in his readings of character and tests. Shocky, the Swiss naturalist, did the same thing that Wilson does. Shocky does not claim to be produced by spirits. Why should Wilson? Mr. Wilson has thus far only proved the phenomena. He has not proved that spirits did it.

Mr. Wilson Replies:

1st.—We answer that in our opening speech we fully defined our ground,—that it is the stepping stone to Spiritualism; the alpha in the alphabet of spiritual phenomena. I have toned it to be the lowest plane generated in A. by B. seated, bearing and speaking just what B. knows. The second step is the operation inside of solid walls under B.'s mesmeric influence, which B. does not perceive nor know. The third stage becomes independent of B. and his influence and induced, or indeed by an unseen and unknown power or mind; no, mark you, the mesmeric influence has changed the power from one mind power into another mind; hence no longer can B. keep the mesmeric steps in, and declare it to be spirits, the clairvoyant, somnambulist, or the mesmerist. Which B. does not perceive and the thoughts of men, why not see spirits, or disembodied men? In the case of the medium seeing the spirit of Clark, the error was in the judgment of the medium, not in the law of control.

2d.—Leroy Sunderland, Dr. H. F. Gardner, Professor Stone, Stearns, Barrows, Lee and others began their experiments in mesmerism, reached clairvoyance, became Spiritualists, and are Spiritualists to day. These artists, scientific minds, becoming with mesmerism, end in Spiritualism, become Spiritualists. Hence, we hold that these results reaching into spiritual convictions are conclusive, and leave not a shadow of a doubt as to the power that produced these things.

Our reply to his theory that the spirit of the little girl moved the two hundred and seventy-five pounds in the chair," is as follows:

1st.—A solid bar of iron seven inches in diameter will not support as heavy a load as fourteen small wires roped together, measuring seven inches in diameter; that the solid bar was surrounding the strength in the fourteen small wires, and the greater weight than one solid stick measuring seven inches in diameter.

2d.—That three men will raise a greater weight than one man.

3d.—That whenever a man can lift a load he thinks he can raise a little more, and will raise it if more than he supposes he can raise. If a man thinks he can lift a ton, he will raise it if he supposes he can raise it. If a man thinks he can lift a ton, he will raise it if he supposes he can raise it. If a man thinks he can lift a ton, he will raise it if he supposes he can raise it.

4th.—That the spirit of the little girl was capable of moving the machine, and was capable to move the two pounds.

5th.—There was a considerable [illegible] the two hundred and seventy-five pounds.

6th.—There was a [illegible] metal bars with [illegible] expedience or medium [illegible] metapbylic] to the physical [illegible]

And one fact never to be overlooked in this question, "Who shall limit the power of the spirit in the human body: or, what and where is the limit or limits cease?" [illegible]

You rob religion of [illegible] man; rob it of all of [illegible] of the Old Testament; Jesus, Peter, James and Paul, of the New Testament, to the next and human being. God and his angels had nothing to do with it. The spirit of [illegible] to the boy or he with ten commandments [illegible] the Red Sea. Joshua's spirit caused the sun to stand still. Ezekiel [illegible] Mary overshadowed [illegible] child. Jesus was [illegible] old. All these things attributed to [illegible] Pentecostal shower [illegible] bodies of the [illegible] can do [illegible] that the [illegible] of Infidelity [illegible] "God's [illegible] child [illegible] from [illegible]

[illegible] and [illegible] men and women [illegible] rest of the [illegible]

3rd.—To all of these propositions we reply:

1st.—The rule laid down by Mr. Braden against the statements and affidavits of parties not present, as well as newspaper reports, sweeps away nine tenths of all that he has said; for the rule is equally applicable to his witnesses, as well as mine.

2nd.—In regard to the Davenport advertisement I can only say I followed the Davenport advertisement in Des Moines, and know that the report that they advertised as jugglers is not correct. What they did advertise is as follows: "What is it?" or a heading to that effect, on the first night. On the second night they came out boldly and announced themselves Spiritualists, and then the devil was to pay.

The third and fourth position that if A. commits a fraud, B. will also, and that if one of their teachers or mediums is proved to be a liar, why are not all liars, is so void of common sense and argument that it does not require an answer, save to repel an insult offered our people. Let us apply the rule. Minister Smyth got drunk on gin-and-milk. Prof. Webster killed Dr. Parkman. Why not all professors kill some one.

The fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth positions on insanity, come under the same rule of law and logic, and fall to the ground. Besides all this, he has swept all these things away in his rulings against heresy.

4th.—To the first proposition we can only say we do not know what he means about the "scare" unless he is alarmed at the magnitude and capacity of his own embodied spirit, for nothing else has undertaken to scare him.

The Dialectic Society, through their sub-committee have, first, proved the phenomena; second, proved that it was above and beyond collusion; third, that it was not done by any of the parties present at thirty-four experiments out of forty; fourth, that it was beyond human agency to do it; fifth, that it claimed to be spirits. Hence, this society have proved that Spiritualism is immensely deserving of the support and confidence of the people.

3rd.—The Harrisburg picture not only proves itself, but it proves that it was done by spirit agency, for here are the witnesses swearing to it. I now read their testimony:

E. V. Wilson—Dear Brother:—The spirit picture we presented to you on Dec. 26th, 1870, was produced precisely as we stated to you, by spirits or angels, and in an incredibly short time. We have since then got several others from the same source, some of which are far more beautiful than the one we gave you—at least we think so—as we said to you when you visited our city last.

The spirits directed us to put the paper in a private room, withdraw, and lock the door, and they would give or produce us a picture. They do not require the presence of the medium in the room when they are at work. Some of the pictures are done in a very short time, and some, again, take days. It seems to depend much or wholly on conditions. I have carried the key, and locked and unlocked the door of the room when these spirit pictures are being made, and have watched closely, carefully and critically the whole proceeding of this most wonderful phenomena, and more especially for the last year, and have seen no cloth and such various kinds of this phenomena that I can truthfully say I have no more reason to doubt the entire truthfulness of the spiritual source through which those pictures came to us than I have to doubt my own existence on this planet, or anything I see with my physical eyes.

Our whole family are entirely satisfied as to the truthfulness of those spirit pictures. We certainly have had no pecuniary interest in them or drawings, but give them to the world, as the good angels direct, and in return get from some of our learned and bigoted brethren nothing but ridicule, abuse and contempt. Still, we shall endeavor to do our duty, believing they know best what we have to say or do.

Having been acquainted with Mr. Joseph Potts and his sons, Andrew and William, both reliable gentlemen, for a number of years, and having visited their house, and seen the improvement in the spirit drawings, I, as well as all their neighbors, consider them above suspicion. And have no hesitancy in affixing to them my official seal. The facts herein stated to E. V. Wilson, are well known and that the handwriting purporting to be his in reference to these wonderful spirit manifestations.

4th.—Does the fact that we say, the Swiss does what I do, and does not know how he does it, prove that I do not know? As well might I say to the man who has experienced religion, you have no religion, for I can find that you can, and I've never had religion.

5th.—I prove Spiritualism and that spirits do these things, when I testify to the fact, as I have done on this platform, time and again during this discussion, by the testimony of Dr. Newcomer, David Eckert, Lyceum reference, and others. I now put in the letters of Sylvester W. Todd, of Wisconsin, and J. Anth. Wood, of Grundy County, Illinois. Also of Mrs. M. H. THE BETTER LAND.

BY EMMA L. DAVIS.

In dreams I've seen a better land—
An angel bright with loving hand
Has walked with me the pearly strand!
And oh, the bright, the beauteous band
In snow-white robes still waiting stand
To guide loved ones to that fair land.

Mortal, fear not to cross Death's stream,
For the angel of a peaceful dream
Stands waiting on the other side.
Though dark the waves and high the tide,
The tempest rage, the river wide,
A loving friend is near to guide:

And on the shore, a bright light gleams,
Where angels wait, as in our dreams.
There are no tears in that bright heaven,
No hearts estranged, no love ties riven,
Mistakes are there forgot, forgiven,
And beauteous crowns to all are given,
For harmony reigns from morn till even,
In that sweet home the angels, heaven.

There is no death, no dying there,
No night, no pain, no grief no care,
No clouds of gloom, or fear and despair,
No pleading hands held up in prayer,
No heavy cross for us to bear,—
But like our dreams, all's bright and fair,
For there's no sin, no sorrow, there.

LITTLE BREECHES.

A PIKE COUNTY VIEW OF SPECIAL PROVIDENCE.

I don't go much on religion,
I never ain't had no show;
But I've got a middling tight grip, sir,
On the handful o' things I know.
I don't pan out on the prophets
And free-will and that sort of thing—
But I b'lieve in God and the angels,
Ever sense one night last spring.

I come into town with some turnips,
And my little Gabe come along—
No four-year old in the county
Could beat him for spunk and strong,
Peart and chipper and sassy,
Always ready to swear and fight—
And I'd larnt him to chaw tobacker,
Jest to keep his milk-teeth white.

The snow came down like a blanket
As I passed by Taggart's store;
I went in for a jag of molasses
And left the team at the door.
They scared at something and started—
I heard one little squall,
And hell-to-split over the prairie
Went team, Little Breeches and all.

Hell-to-split over the prairie!
I was almost froze with fear;
But we rousted up some torches,
And searched for 'em far and near.
At last we struck hosses and wagon,
Snowed under a soft white mound,
Up-sot, dead beat—but of little Gabe
No hide nor hair was found.

And here all hope soured on me
Of feller-critter's aid—
I just flopped down on my marrow-bones,
Crotch-deep in the snow, and prayed.

* * * * * * * *

By this the torches was played out,
And me and Jarul Parr
Went off for some wood to a sheep-fold
That he said was somewhar thar.

We found it at last, and a little shed
Where they shut up the lambs of a night.
We looked in and seen them huddled thar,
So warm and sleepy and white.
And purty soon Little Breeches and chirped
As peart as ever you see,
"I want a chaw of tobacker,
And that's what's the matter of me."

How did he git thar? Angels.
He could never have walked in that storm.
They jest scooped down and toted him
To where it was safe and warm.
And I think that saving a little child,
And bringing him to his own,
Is a darned sight better business
Than loafing around the Throne.

PICTURES ON GLASS.

What is it, how is it done, and who does it?

BROTHER JONES:—In the JOURNAL of March 25th I noticed an article headed,—What is it, how is it, and who does it? After reading the article, I asked in my own mind, Can these things be done? The answer came, Yes—they can. But still doubting, I wrote to the Postmaster of Milan, asking him to carefully investigate the matter, and write me the fac's as they existed with other testimony corroborating his, and I received in due season the inclosed letter which you will please publish for the benefit of others who doubt the power of spirits to manifest themselves and do such wonderful works.

WM. H. HOAG.

Joliet, Ill., April 4th, 1871.

WM. H. HOAG—DEAR SIR:—Yours, dated Joliet, March 25th, has been handed me by the Postmaster of this place, to whom it was directed, and who, for reasons best known to himself, declined answering. Some people esteem it a mark of wisdom to treat with silent contempt any question, which if answered candidly, would be contrary to preconceived opinions. Not being one of that school myself, I will endeavor to give the answer you seek,—viz. the strange phenomena published in the JOURNAL, and in doing so, I have simply to say that in the main they are true—perhaps it would be as well to say that the picture of the man at the Brotherton Exchange, is not recognised by all as Major Marsh but by many of his most intimate acquaintances it is recognized very readily, but aside from those reported in the JOURNAL, there has been developed in different windows in this place, at least four more pictures more clear and distinct than those at my house, as they are located as follows; At Deacon Baxter Ashleys' Jewelry Store, a negro woman, second story of building; at Andrew's Hall, third story, an old man unknown; at Roberts, or Lyceum Hall, second story, an Indian, apparently about thirty years old—the best in my opinion of any of the pictures. In the old King Block, second story, in a window occupied as a dwelling by Lucina Minard, a good-looking man, about fifty years of age to all appearances, and what is very strange, as the JOURNAL termed it, is that none of these glasses, so far as I know, have the least stain or shade when viewed from the inside, and what is just as curious, is that many who look at these pictures, say that they do not see any likeness to whatever. Whether it is, as it was at the resurrection of Jesus, that none but witnesses before chosen of God can see these or not I do not know, but of one thing we are certain, that more have seen these than the record says ever saw Jesus at his resurrection, or after the same, hence we conclude if it is well to believe that Jesus arose from the dead and ascended into heaven, and sitteth at the right hand of His Father, that it is still better for us to believe these things which our eyes do see and our neighbors do testify of.

Let me say in conclusion that perhaps as many as twenty more pictures are reported in different parts of the town, but we have not seen them, hence we do not vouch for them, but of these which we have mentioned and those which were reported in the JOURNAL, we will testify to be true and correct.

The Mind Beyond the Grave.

We cannot but feel that we are beings of a two-fold nature—that our journey to the tomb is short, and the existence beyond it immortal. Is there any attainment that we may reserve, when we lay down the body? We know, that of the gold that perishes, we may take none with us when dust returneth to dust. Of the treasures which the mind accumulates, may we carry aught with us to that bourne, whence no traveler returns? We may have been delighted with the studies of nature, and penetrated into those caverns where she perfects her chemistry in secret. Compoaing and decomposing—changing matter into nameless forms—pursuing the subtlest essences through the air, and resolving even that air into its original element—what will be the gain, when we pass from the material to the immaterial, and this great museum and laboratory, the time-worn earth, shall dissolve in its own central fires? We may have become adepts in the physiology of man—scanning the mechanism of the eye, till light itself unfolded its invisible laws—of the ear, its most hidden reticulations confessed their mysterious agency with sound—of the heart, till that citadel of life revealed its hermit policy—but will these researches be available, in a state of being which "eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived!" Will he who fathoms the waters, and computes their pressure and power, have need of his skill "Where there is no more sea?" Will the mathematician exercise the lore by which he measured the heavens—or the astronomer, the science which discovered the stars, when called to go beyond their light? Those who have penetrated most deeply into the intellectual structure of man, lifted the curtain from the birthplace of thought, traced the springs of action to the fountain, and thrown the veiled and striking motive into the crucible, perceive the object of their study, taking a new form, entering disembodied an unknown state of existence, and receiving powers adapted to its laws and modes of intercourse. We have no proof that the sciences, to which hours of labor have been devoted, will survive the tomb. But the impressions they have made—the dispositions they have nurtured—the good or evil they have helped to stamp upon the soul, will go with it to eternity. The adoring awe, the deep humility, inspired by the study of the planets and their laws—the love of truth, which he cherished who pursued the sciences that demonstrates it—will find a response among angels and arch-angels. The praise that was learned amid the melodies of nature, or from the lyre of consecrated genius, may pour its perfected tones from a seraph's harp. The goodness taught in the whole frame of creation, by the flower lifting its honey-cup to the insect, and the leaf drawing a green curtain round the nursing chamber of the smallest bird; by the pure stream, refreshing both the grass and the flocks that feed on it, the trees, and the master of its fruits; the tender charity caught from the happiness of the humblest creature, will be at home in His presence, who hath pronounced himself the "God of love." The studies, therefore, which we pursue, as the means of intellectual delight, or the instruments of acquiring wealth and honor among men, are valuable at the close of life only as they have promoted those dispositions which constitute the bliss of an unending existence. Tested by its tendencies beyond the grave, religion, in its bearings and results, transcends all other sciences. The knowledge which it imparts does not perish with the stroke which dismantles the body from its ethereal companion. While its precepts lead to the highest improvement of this state of probation, its spirit is congenial with that ineffable reward to which we aspire.—Mrs. Sigourney.

The Lecture.

BRO. JONES:—We had the pleasure last Sunday evening, of listening to a lecture delivered by J. R. Francis, Associate Editor of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, at Crosby's Music Hall. He was listened to by an audience who were highly appreciative, and yet very critical. After some music, and a song by the Williams family, Mr. Francis arose, under partial control. This was done by his guides, as preparatory to the flood of inspiration which they intended to throw on his brain during the evening. Clasping his hands in the usual manner for prayer, he raised his eyes to heaven, and began his invocation. "O Thou—but to whom shall we pray? To what commonly acknowledged source of power and omniscience shall we direct our supplications tonight? Shall we pray to the triune orthodox God, or shall it be the God of Moses? Shall we turn our face toward Mecca, and raise our voice to worship Allah, the God of Mahomet, or shall we prostrate our bodies in the dust before the mighty power of Brahm, the God of the Hindoos? Shall we offer up sacrifices in order to propitiate Osiris, the God of the Egyptians, or shall we accept the Father God and Mother Nature of Andrew Jackson Davis? To whom shall we pray? To whom shall we turn and ask for light and strength for our daily task? Surely not to one whom we have never seen, and whom we can not comprehend. No! let us pray to those whom we have seen; to those whose loving influences we can feel ever around us; to those loving friends whom we know are, constantly with us; to those dear ones who are always clustering near us, who guard and guide us in our daily tasks,—to them let us pray, if we pray at all." The invocation struck us as being peculiarly original and unique, but perfectly in harmony with the man and the bold ideas he is so steadily advancing.

After some more music, and another song by the choir, Mr. Francis arose and began his lecture. The subject chosen was, "The Orthodox God a Myth," and those who were fortunate enough to be present to listen to the words of inspired eloquence as they fell from his lips, will long remember the hour.

Starting out with the accepted orthodox God, he reviewed his works in a way that would have frightened a good old orthodox soul.—"And the Lord God commanded the man saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat, but of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it; for in the day thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die." Here was the orthodox God telling Adam that he should surely die if he disobeyed him. Why should he talk in th's way to Adam? Adam couldn't understand him. He had never seen any one die. Adam never saw a funeral! Adam never saw a hearse! He had never stood by the bedside of a dying friend, and watched the lamp of life flicker lower and lower, and at last witness the departure of the spirit. Why tell Adam that he should do that of which he had not the slightest comprehension? As well tell the first dumb animals you meet, that if they disobey you they will die; they will comprehend you as readily as Adam could the orthodox God. As the judiciousness of this scene became apparent to the audience, their risibles became considerably affected. The idea was simple enough, but it had never been presented to them before in that light.

The speaker then traced the history of this God down through succeeding stages, and showed conclusively that he originated in the plastic mind of Moses; brought into existence, in fact, through the necessities of the times in which we first hear of him.

He next took up Brahm, the God of the Hindoo, tracing back his history and showing that from the mythology of the Hindoos the orthodox have received all the authority they have for the creation of their three gods in one; the former having in their list Brahm the Creator, Vishnu the Preserver, and Siva the Destroyer, —whilst the latter have God the Creator, Jesus the Preserver (or Savior), and Satan the Destroyer (or Devil). He then drew a parallel between the virtues and steadfastness of Brahm and the flitting, transitory character of the orthodox God, which was certainly not calculated to raise the latter in the estimation of the audience.

The speaker continued thus for an hour reviewing the God-ideas which are accepted among the peoples of earth, showing that they were but an outgrowth of their dependent natures. He stepped boldly out of the heretofore prescribed limits of thought in regard to this question, attacking and dispelling every fossilized idea which seemed to be in the way of his researches. Some few of his auditors were slow to accept his idea in relation to an infinite, intelligent God; they had so long indulged their pet theory, that it seemed impossible for them to give up in the slightest degree their hold on him. So, as their darling idea was attacked, they hugged it all the closer to their breasts; but toward the close of the lecture, many began to doubt in reference to their being right about the theory to which they had clung so long, and which they had hitherto considered invincible. The great majority of the audience, however, went with the speaker heart and soul. They were liberal enough to know that the truth would stand in the end, and that its best interests would be subserved by a thorough discussion of this as well as other subjects, and so they followed him, confident that they would be well repaid for their time and attention.

This is the first lecture that Mr. Francis has given here on a subject in any way appertaining to Spiritualism. We predic for him a brilliant future, and we feel safe in saying, that if the lecture of Sunday evening is an evidence of his powers, he will soon rise in rank second to no other speaker in the field of reform. In his next lecture he will take for his subject 'Tae sixty-one thousand Ministers of the Gospel,—their morality and immorality, and the effects of their teachings on humanity.'

A STORY OF COUNCIL BLUFFS.

By Edward Mintura.

Places of romantic beauty, scenery wild and picturesque in its character are not very frequently found in Iowa—indeed it is the farmer's paradise, a land fitted for the realities more than the dreams of life. Yet in the leafy groves, high bluffs, and deep ravines about Council Bluffs—its streams and wooded knolls, there is enough of romantic beauty to satisfy any one who has seen the wild grandeur of the Yo-Semite, the fearful chasms of the Colorado, or the wilds of the snow-crowned Sierras of the far, far West.

Years gone, there was a great pow-wow of pale faces and red men near where the city of Council Bluffs now stands in its beauty and many graces. Great chiefs from the Omahs, Pawnee, and Sioux were there—the less warlike Pottawatomies were represented; indeed almost all of the contiguous tribes, except alone the treacherous Cheyennes, were there. Of the latter, no known agent was present, though they had received presents and messengers with the others and promised to be there.

General Harney, the dread of the red men, the king of the pale faced war-chiefs, strode to and fro about the council ground, his red face flushed with excitement, his eyes flashing as he glanced from war-chief to war-chief, with a look which told that he had rather fight than talk, and those parties were not of his willing or getting up.

Camped around, glittering with beads, calicoes and ribbons, were the squaws of the chiefs and warriors, not daring to approach the circle of their lords, but among themselves keeping up that clattering which with all races seems to be a part of woman nature.

The hour of the council drew near—the government officers were seen in their most showy uniforms, gathering toward the great circle centered by the council fire—the chiefs in paint, feathers and blankets, approached, and finally to the rapid drum beat, all came together.

It was a gallant sight. Full twenty officers in their handsome uniforms, seated on camp-stools, with their interpreters close at hand, full one hundred chiefs and warriors in all their finery upon the ground, so seated in the circle that each could see the other's face, or hear another's words when he rose to speak.

The great calumet or pipe of peace was brought and filled by a white-haired prophet of the Omahas. It had a huge bowl made from the red stone of the far north; its long stem was ornamented with dove's feathers—it was never used on a less occasion than this.

Going to the sacred council-fire which with due ceremony had been lighted, the white-haired prophet took up a bright coal and placed it on the tobacco and killikinnick; then, with the stem to his lips, he drew a whiff of smoke and sent it circling up toward the heavens!

This was the invocative offering to the Great Spirit.

Next, drawing a whiff to each point of the compass, north, south, east, and west, he propitiated the spirits of the wind.

Then advancing to General Harney he handed him the pipe and said:

"Great War King of the Pale Faces! Son of the Great Father in Washington! let the Peace-pipe from your lips go round the circle and come back to me empty!"

The General drew a whiff from the pipe and passed it to the next in rank, and thus it went from man to man until it once more reached the white-haired prophet.

His face darkened as he looked at the pipe.

"Brothers!" he cried, "we are met here to make peace. But there is bad blood here. Some one means evil. There is blood upon the pipe!"

And holding it aloft he pointed to a dark stain almost black, on the bright red bowl.

"Who is the traitor? Is he an Omaha? If so, let him speak! Is he a Cheyenne with a Pawnee blanket upon him?"

No one spoke. The old man paused and seemed to reflect what next to do or say, for he had been selected to lead the council.

The General, long used to Indian ways, preserved a dignified composure, spoke no word, nor did he give any sign.

"The pipe must go around again!" said the prophet.

And even as he spoke, the dark spot vanished from it. He noticed this but said not a word. The pipe was refilled and with the same ceremony lighted again.

Once more from the General's lips it passed on, this time being followed by the keen eye of the propect of the Omahas.

It had almost swept the circle, when, with a sharp cry, the prophet sprang forward, wrenched the pipe from the hands of the warrior who held it, with one hand, and with the other tore the blanket from his stalwart form.

"Behold!" he shouted. "Here is the Black Vulture of the Cheyennes hidden in the blanket of a Pawnee. His hand is red with the blood of a hundred pale-faces. The truth would blister his false tongue. He has come as a spy to our council. Even now Cheyenne warriors may be near, thirsting for our blood, waiting but his signal to strike! He has dishonoured the peace pipe! He must die! I have spoken!"

The ominous grunt of approval broke from every warrior's lip. The prophet spoke, and from beyond the circle, for no weapon was allowed within it, a keen tomahawk was thrown at his feet.

He bent to take it up, but before the handle met his hand it was seized by the Black Vulture who, with a fiendish yell, dashed it deep among his white hairs. Then, with a bound, like that of a tiger roused from its lair, he cleared the circle, and while a hundred warriors rushed for their weapons and in pursuit, he sprung down the hillside into a dark, ravine and was out of sight.

The white-haired prophet dead, still held the blood-stained calumet in his clasp, while the wonder-stricken warriors hastened to avenge his fate.

But soon up from that ravine, toward which they hurried, came a cloud of warriors and the yell of full five times their number of foes who under the lead of the Black Vulture, now moved on to destroy them.

It was well indeed for those chiefs that Harney was there, and the noble Sumner with his mounted riflemen, else not one of them or their squaws had ever returned to the villages they had left.

The troops which had been kept out of sight now galloped forward and soon whistling lead was flying in exchange for the headed arrows. The Cheyennes, fighting desperately, fell back, but not until the Black Vulture fell, did they fairly take to flight.

Then, attempting only escape, they rode madly to the banks of the deep Missouri, but the well-armed pale-faces were close behind and few of them reached the other bank.

What was the mystery, or how the blood appeared on the calumet, we may never know, but doubtless it saved a bloody massacre which would have sent mourning among many tribes and cost the United States some of the best officers in the service.

And this is but one of many evidences which can be written about "Council Bluffs."

Letter from Charles H. Read.

BROTHER JONES—Dear Sir: In the last issue of the JOURNAL, I notice an article from one R. Garter, of Coldwater, Mich., in which he complains that he was not permitted to see me, etc., etc.

Permit me to say that Mr. Garter had all the opportunity in the world to come and investigate during my stay at Coldwater, which was about ten days. I told publicly that if there were any persons too poor to pay, that I would admit them free, which is my usual custom everywhere. If you will look over his letter, to you, you will notice that he saw my posters and circulars. Now, why, if Mr. Garter was so earnest to see me, did he not do so while I was there? He had as good an opportunity as any one else, as I gave two public seances and two private ones.

Then again, he says I charged a fee to all. Does Mr. Garter think, or even suppose I can hire halls, pay license, hotel bills, etc., and let such earnest men as him in the cause pay me a visit without my being paid therefor? No one can do it. Too many such men as Mr. Gasly are now in the ranks, and mediums would die of starvation before such men would lend a helping hand to them.

Again, he asks, "In what light shall I hold him up to the public?" I do not know Mr. Garter, neither do I wish him to "hold me up to the public;" and in return I would like to know the character of this man. I have as much right to ask you as to his character as he has mine, through the columns of your very valuable paper.

By the tone of his letter, he never heard of me before. He certainly cannot be a subscriber to either the JOURNAL, or BANNER OF LIGHT, nor does he read them, or he would have seen my name mentioned. In order that he may learn of me, as well as other good mediums, I respectfully ask him to subscribe for the JOURNAL, and he will then get all the news he wants in reference to mediums.

As to my characters, I leave the people at large to form their own conclusions.

I shall be in Chicago about Thursday of next week, May 11th, without fail. I go from here to Niles, Mich., then to La Porte, Ind., from there direct to Chicago, when I shall be happy to meet with all friends who wish to call upon me. Parties who would like me to hold seances within one hundred miles of Chicago, may address me, care of RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, as I shall make Chicago my headquarters until further notice.

Elkhart, Ind., May 4th, 1871.

ROSICRUCIAN MUSINGS.

By F. B. Dowd.

LIBERTY is a strange word, and has a strange significance. The world has always had great love and reverence for Liberty, without understanding what it really means,—at least, it so seems to me.

To be "at liberty," is to be free, absolutely and unqualifidly. In nature we find no such freedom. The rock is free to lie in one place, subject to the action of sunshine and storm, until it attains the freedom of earth. Then, indeed, it blossoms in the flower, and scatters its fragrance here and there, with a little more freedom; but this is only in degree, the same as in the rock. Some flowers have more freedom than others, for they send their fragrance to a greater distance. The waters of earth are at liberty to bask in sunlight and evaporate to a broader liberty, or to leap and dance down the mountain-side, or murmur along the valleys; but they are bound within their banks, and flow on downward always. Light, although as free almost as human thought, is measured, bounded and limited by obstacles which chain and handcuff the radiant creature in abject slavery, and cast shadows of gloom, gaunt specires of primordial nothingness, which stretch their phantom hands carcssingly and warningly across her lovely face. The worm is at liberty to crawl and burrow, but not to fly. The birds of the air are at liberty to fly, but not through the earth nor beyond a certain height in the atmosphere. The worm has a little more liberty than the mould in which it burrows; so also the fowl has more than the worm,—but each is free in degree, in its sphere, its condition. A fish in a pond is free to explore its utmost limits, but not to crawl upon the land nor fly in the air. The serpent may explore the pond and the land, but may not navigate the atmosphere as a bird. So, as we ascend from rock to vegetable, from vegetation to worm, and from worm to man, we find each individual thing enjoying freedom according to its condition. We find then, that Liberty is dependent upon power. Power is the measure of Liberty.

Man differs only from vegetation in being cut loose from the roots. He grows, blossoms, and bears fruit, and in doing this rises to superior conditions, wherein he appreciates and understands a little more of the divine significance of that sentiment we call Liberty, of which nature, and of which the fragrance of the flower speaks Liberty. The power to radiate belongs to man and animals, the same as to the floral kingdom, varying only in degree, and this power is the base of Liberty to radiate. The great lesson of our lives and of liberty may be learned from the vegetable kingdom, if we will not shut our eyes to the inspirations of nature, which, like the aroma of the rose, demands attention. The grand object of nature in man is to civilize him, and thus lead him up to God's boundless light of Liberty and Peace.

The race, like individuals, must have its infancy, its weaknesses and follies, its want of self-control,—in short, its barbarism. In this condition obstacles stand in the way, and the sun of Liberty transforms their shadows into monsters at which man, child-like, is affrighted. He longs for light; he struggles to attain it,—often wading through his brother's blood to escape the shadow which always haunts him. In his ignorance he thinks upon the shadow, as if it were a demon. With eyes wild with madness, he glares at shadows continually, and with teeth and claws tears up the earth in the vain hope of gaining the broad light of Liberty, not knowing that if he turns his back upon the shadows they are gone. Still he grows, shadows increase,—the night is only begun when shadow-like he drops into the grave. He has lived, longed, and struggled to remove obstacles which barred the way to Liberty and light, until the fatal lesson is at last forced home to him, that he has only increased the shadows and the gloom,—that he has only been adding meshes to the net in which he has flounders all his days,—that Liberty, though sweet, is only a dream.

For children, restraint is necessary. For barbarians, laws, jails and gibbets are so many schools, whose lessons, though hard, are only shadows cast by the sweet, glorious sun of Liberty.

So onward struggling, man's physical nature, vegetable-like, matures, and the mind, blossom-like, sends its aroma out upon the desert air, to make cheerful the otherwise desolate scene.

The physical body is only a vegetable. The mind is its blossom. Our thoughts, words and acts are spirit, or the aroma which, atmosphere-like, flows around us and is more pleasant to others. The fruit—ah! what is that which comes after the flower has shed its fragrance, and its leaves are withered and gone with the winds? Is it gold and silver, houses and lands? Are these cities, railroads, palaces of art, schools of science, the fruits of this life of lights and shades? If so then he has reached the most of these hath the greatest liberty, hath borne the most fruit. These are indeed physical fruits of toil, the shadows of which I have spoken; but there is another fruit within this, which is hidden and unseen, upon which the gods make merry. Within the mind, as within a flower, grows this fruit which does not appear until flower has lost its fragrance and its beauty departed.

This physical fruit,—these possessions acquired by toil and mental effort,—are food for the God within, upon which he feeds and grows strong, or sickens with disgust at its unwholesomeness. Sweet indeed is that fruit when it has grown in the soil of good deeds, and been watered by tears of sympathy, and fanned by the winds of good thoughts,—then man sits down when the beauty and fragrance of his mind has departed, and his influence lives only in the memory of others, and partakes of the fruits of his life, as he declines to the grave, and his spiritual body grows strong and luscious on the rich wines of his wealth, pressed out by use and not abuse. There are spiritual houses and lands, cities, palaces of art, and schools of science within this gaudy show of earth,—within its external pomp and pride,—which is the spiritual fruit upon which immortal life is based; the seeds of another existence. This fruit—spiritual and ideal though it be—is Love. This is, indeed, another name for Liberty. Love is the soul of Bibesty, as earthly possessions are its body. The masses know only its body; and this makes them sad.

The body is always in bonds,—always under laws which restrict and limit its action and defy its freedom. Thought is more free. It knows no distance, no obstacles, no time, nor other conditions. Thought, swifter than lightning visibly through worlds and space and stops not even at the throne of the Infinite.

This is Liberty. But this freedom of thought is not attained save through ideal love. Man requires conditions for thought which enslave more than laws and kings the body. These conditions,—these obstacles,—are not only creeds, but are the external loves of mankind. The banker fixes his mind, thoughts and loves upon gold, stocks, bonds, and business, until his mind is as much enslaved as any slave who ever wore a chain. What does such a man know of liberty? Nothing. The sensualist is a slave as much so as the toper. The drayman is a; fish in his little pond. Bunsparte is another in another pond. So all mankind are slaves while loudly talking of Liberty. Kings are more slaves than their waiters.

The unselfish are alone free. Fear is a tyrant before whom the world bows down and worships in sickening idolatry. The fear of want hath made this world a mad-house, and filled it with howling maniacs.

"Power lies at the bottom of all Liberty. Power begins at home, and its first manifestation is in self-control.

The child begins it by learning to use its hands; ends, in most cases by the use and abuse of body and mind. But the true human stops not at mind. He goes beyond and lays the egg of spiritual existence—namely: love—in his mind; and, like a faithful hen, keeps it warm by the pressure of meditation,—if thought and aspiration—until therefrom is hatched a spiritual body, which is free as the thought of an archangel; knowing no laws and no conditions. Death makes no one spiritual. This is indeed the object of this existence, and if not accomplished, there is no spirituality beyond the grave—no more than here—and no more freedom. Love must be materialized here, or never. Why, then, if this love shall have been diverted and prostituted to that which is selfish and worthless, is the fruit worth? What have you, reader, on the other side, if unselfish love is all that is immortal?

If ideal and unselfish love is the germ of immortal existence—the germ of a spiritual body —the strength and nourishment of that which is to be—when you are stripped of your selfishness and your earthly possessions (for remember these have no part nor place beyond earth and that which pertains thereto), then what have you?—where is your germ?—where your strength?—where your thoughts?—where your boasted freedom?—where is the world, all rotten with wealth and woe, with boastful art and science, when stripped of selfishness? NOTHING! is written upon its brow.

Let your soul bow low, reader, before this gorgeous truth, preached from the diadem of God before which the great of all ages have prostrated. Realize that love of self is the worst kind of slavery. It narrows you down to a point, around which you revolve in circles growing smaller and smaller until you are nothing but a point, which is a cipher.

The unselfish soul is the only great. The loving heart is alone void of fear; and hence the only freedom is in love. "Love casteth out all fear" is as true now as ever. Control yourself! The man who can control himself under all circumstances is master of the universe. Here is the legitimate field for the growth and exercise of power. As I said before, there is no Liberty without power first.

There can be no self-control until the love-nature is mastered—is turned away from external nature and drawn within. This is the kingdom of heaven, where Liberty reigns, sweet and tranquil. The nature full of unselfish love can not curse nor repine at misfortunes. To him are prayers and tears over the follies of mankind, and the heartlessness of so-called humans.

Self-control, when complete, embraces not merely body and mind, but also the spiritual nature. Bodily control is muscular action; this, of course, all beings are in possession of, but here will be found the same diversity or degrees of power, and consequent freedom of action. In some men there is no waste materials; every muscle and nerve seems full of vitality and power, while in others it is lacking. This control is susceptible of growth and culture. The world is beginning to understand a little of the importance of physical education, the draining of muscles lungs bones, and joints, but it knows but little of bodily control, after all.

We know a little how the physical affects the mental, and a little how to use fists and muscles to advantage; but know nothing of the method of changing physical nature from impure, diseased conditions to pure and healthy conditions. The reason is obvious. Science ignores all but body and mind; and the latter it considers not as the cause, but as the effect of organization. It says there is no spirit, i. e., no actual organism, with will, spirit, which, with tools and fashions both mind and body. It says laws are arbitrary, unyielding, and infinite; that organization fixes destiny. This is so to a certain extent, but this extent we have not measured, and I have a right to assume what science can not demonstrate, when that assumption is supported by reason—by analogy—by reason. Laws are only modes of action; and these modes are as much under my control as the acts themselves.

We have no mental philosophy. When the world recognizes this truth, that the mind is physical and muscular, that thought is a living entity, which enters into the womb of the mind from its Father-God—suggestions—and is there conceived and clothed in our own flesh and blood, and in due time born into our physical bodies, there becoming a part of us, changing our entire physical being; then will they understand the influence which spirit exerts upon man, and the importance of spiritual culture as well as mental and physical. First the physical, next the spiritual, the mental. These are that which appears to sense; but really that which was first is that which appears last viz., the spiritual.

Why talk to a physical being of a mind? an idiot, for instance. Why talk to a physical and mental being of a spirit, unless he has grown up to that condition wherein he knows such exists? Why, indeed, why change his external conditions? Why talk to youth of spiritual things? They hear you, but they can not conceive your thought until time has ripened their physical and mental nature, then your teachings, or such as are retained, do them good.

Mental control the world knows but little of. To control one's eyes seems like a simple thing, but why, what is to do this? The mind is to do this also, which see even when we wish to be blind. Behold the world running mad to see the sights! Behold, also, the sights covered from the outward gaze, born in us, from out a world we have long since forgotten.

To control one's ears is not an easy task, for the rush and rattle of the world is always calling us to hear. The mind, also, has ears, which, when open, hear the voice of God.

Who hath taught us at any time to be deaf to the thunders of nature and man—to close the physical ear and open the mental, and listen to the "still, small voice"—indeed! who has told us what the voice is, or how it sounds, or how to listen! Think of freedom! when all the phenomena of nature holds us paralyzed in its grasp! But then we may awaken from this paralysis; for 'tis only mind and body which sleeps.

The awakening is culture, but not the culture the world teaches. It is a small thing to control the hands to manipulate material substances; but this control is gained by long years of practice, and even then, how awkward we are! How many failures the most skilful make! The mind also has hands, which grasp at the unknown, grasp and handle it with its keys; grasp and handle and unknown, which reach out through space without limit or hindrance.

Who hath taught us the methods of mental control? Without motion, no distance!

We have the power of physical speech; so has the mind. But who has taught its language? or the sound of its speech, aside from looks, gestures and motions?

Who has power of mental control? Not many! To stand unmoved, without fear or agitation, in presence of danger is a great thing; yet this control is merely physical—the power of mind over the nerves.

Who can stand behind an enemy unmoved, and let his curses fall unheeded upon the ear, or receive his blows in the face, and not strike back? Not many. Yet this is done by effort of mind.

Control begins in the spiritual, but its first visible manifestation is in the physical, next, to the mental, and then returns to the spiritual; and there is no perfect control until the spirit is at once under control as the physical. Mental culture stands in point. This is the foundation of all that is above mind. But who is capable of creating mental states or conditions capable of inducing spiritual conditions? Who has the key? Not many? Yet there are a few. Belief in ones' self is foundation of power to accomplish. Doubt and distrust of ability destroys power. To believe, to have faith, is more than three-fourths of the battle. Believe first, and then the evidence comes afterwards to confirm and lead you on to knowing. We are not absolutely free to believe, but free in that limited sense of which I have spoken.

Evidence is the foundation of belief; but that which is evidence satisfactory to one, is unsatisfactory to another; this is because some are more free than others. He that walks as one in a dream with the outer senses closed as a door, heeding not the gaudy panorama of passing nature, with its shadows and lights, its voices and sights, its rough and vulgar contact; hath entered into his closet, and there listens and sees with the mind, takes hold with mental hands, of the ALL MIND, whose touch is transformation. Such are free to believe—are free to shut the doors through which visible objects and nature enters, with its temptations and its doubts—devils in angel garbs sent to lure man from true freedom and liberty in God.

Control is in the mind—at least it so appears to be. I mean that the power springs from soul, which, blind and deaf, has tried in vain to overpower with the mind when its second manifestation i. e., voluntary, or will action begins. Doubt is the antagonist of belief. It destroys it, as death destroys life. Fear is a mind destroyer; for as spirituality destroys animality, when at its extreme. Understand me to say that this antagonism is only relative, but relatively is our field of labor, for we do not know what absolute is. Death swallows up life, and vomits it out into other conditions. Mind swallows up body, and vomits out thought. Spirituality swallows up carnal nature, and then vomits out material—our Father-God. Belief swallows up doubt, and man acquires knowledge. Knowledge swallows up belief, and forthwith faith is born, which in turn swallows up knowledge, and knowledge becomes a dead letter. Belief at its height is what a man is; mental assent is only its weakest phase; knowledge its highest; when belief ceases, i. e., seconds higher, or descends lower, we arrive at any knowledge, belief must cease as regards that knowledge; but there is ever beyond the realm of knowledge an infinite realm of mystery unsolved, to be believed in or rejected, which leads to investigation, and narrows the mind down to its little realm of facts; hence robs man of real power, which comes of expansion.

Belief strengthens when we cease investigation, and forget to doubt. This growing stronger, it culminates in knowledge—positive fact. To believe in self, strengthens self. To believe in God, strengthens God, which is God. To believe in the supernatural, is to open the mind, inasmuch as it leads to a knowledge thereof. When this knowledge is gained, we no longer believe, but know. Knowledge is foundation of faith, which is its antagonist. Is Knowledge of man's power given faith in self; but faith is greatest, for we have more faith in ourselves than our knowledge of ourselves warrants, and we often astonish ourselves in our undertakings, by reason of blind faith in luck or chance. To know ourselves weakness, is to destroy one's strength. It is only when we turn aside from ourselves, and forget what we know of ourselves that we are really great. This knowledge of ourselves is the doubt, which, entering in, destroys faith in ourselves.

He who can forget his knowledge of nature and her laws, forgets himself and his doubt—hath faith and power to walk on the water, or in the air, or to make bread of the atmosphere. Knowledge of God destroys or swallows up belief in God, and reaches on, and growing, culminates in faith, blind and void of knowledge of nature or laws—in God the absolute and only free existence. To doubt the existence of God, of mystery, of power, supernatural and infinite, and man's capacity to reach unconditional power wherein dwells freedom, is to destroy the knowledge thereof; to rob one's self of power derived therefrom; to invoke unrest and dissatisfaction, and narrow one's self down to the blank, worthless cipher of human knowledge, as derived from investigation of matter and its laws, and bind in chains of slavery the soul divine. To one who has faith, knowledge is of no account, i. e., mean knowledge of things less than that which is centred in self-faith. Belief first, knowledge next, faith lastly, and this swallows up the two first, and translates them into other modes and conditions of existence, where laws to us are unknown. Body, or sense, corresponds to belief; mind, or its higher manifestations, correspond to knowledge; spirit, or the ultimate result of body and mind, belief and knowledge, correspond to faith.

SPIRIT POWER.

By Wm. B. Fahnestock.

That spirits have power to impress individuals, under certain conditions, as well as to move ponderable bodies, has been too often demonstrated to be doubted by those who have made the necessary investigation; but how these things are effected, and under what conditions, is a matter but little understood by most spirits as well as men, and it is amusing to see the efforts many of them have made to account for their being done.

Spirits admit that certain conditions of the medium are necessary,—but they do not say what those conditions are,—as the following extracts from the work of Hrof. Hare will show, viz:

"We cannot come into direct contact with physical matter, but we are able, through the sphere of the medium, when natural conditions are complied with, not only to communicate our thoughts and wishes to our friends, but to move solid, ponderable bodies."

This is true, but the inquiring mind would like to know what the nature of the condition referred to is, and as the spirits have made no further explanations, it is to be presumed that the peculiar sphere or state of the medium was not known to them.

Again, they go on to say: "When we wish to impress the mind of the medium by an effort of the magic will (provided always that he or she is in sympathy, or sustains a negative relation to the operator), we can dispose and arrange the magnetic currents of the brain so as to form or fashion them into ideas of our own. We can also learn to read the thoughts of another, conditions being favorable."

Here we have an acknowledgment that to derange things the medium must be in sympathy or sustain a negative relation to the operator, and although they speak of arranging the magnetic currents of the brain so as to form or fashion them to ideas of their own, there is no idea conveyed that would give us positive knowledge, any more than how they can read the mind of others when conditions are favorable.

"Thoughts," they continue, "being motions of the mind, assume specific and definite forms, and when distinct in the mind can be seen and understood by the spirit who is in sympathy with the mind in which they are generated."

Here sympathy or conditions are again necessary, but "to influence mechanically the Keys of a medium to move at will," they must direct currents of vitalized (spiritual) electricity on the particular muscle "they desire to control, and to produce raps, the voluntary discharge of this "vitalized and spiritual electricity" from the [illegible] come in contact with the "animal [illegible] emanating from the medium."

[illegible] about as clear as the article. I have [illegible] compare muddled passages to, and I [illegible] to comprehend what this "vitalized spiritual electricity" is like, unless it is simply the will or the spiritual aura coming in contact with the aura of the medium. Rats can be understood; and although the word aura does not sound as learned as "vitalized spiritual electricity," or "the animal electricity of the medium," I think it will be more easily understood,—and is, no doubt, nearer in truth.

I have made the above extracts to show that spirits must have conditions or they cannot impress individuals or move physical bodies; but in all spiritual books and papers I have seen their powers ascribed to nothing but magnetism.

If a medium was clairvoyant, magnetism was the cause of it; if clairaudient, or able to feel, smell, or taste things at a distance, it was magnetism that caused it. Magnetism caused the raps, lifted men, tables, pianos, and did all other wonderful exploits, at the same time that it put people to sleep, cured their diseases, and accounted for all the mysteries that were never before explained. Light was its child, electricity its brother, and mineral magnetism its bosom friend. Then who will not say, "All hail! animal magnetism?"

I have but to say, that it has not the powers that have been ascribed to it. If it did exist, and what is said of it were true, it would be very easy to say, when asked a difficult question, "Oh, it is magnetism, animal magnetism, which is entirely different from mineral magnetism, consequently explains all that is to be explained. It accounts for the aurora borealis, the precession of the equinoxes, holds comets in their course, etc." But seriously, these are not exaggerations, for only absurd cases have been ascribed to it, in many works that I could name, were I so disposed.

The whole truth in regard to the condition necessary for spirit control is, that the subject or medium shall be in a passive, somnambulic condition, and it will be found impossible for any spirit to control them unless they are so. But when subjects are in a perfect condition, spirits by impressing their mind, have extraordinary powers, and often effect cures in an instant.

That mediums are in a somnambulic condition when controlled by spirits, is easily proved by requesting spirits to leave the mediums in the condition in which they found them when they took control. If this be done, they will be clearminded in all their faculties, and can use them at a distance.

DEITY.

By J. Russell Robinson.

We desire to make a few friendly remarks for publication in your interesting journal, not by way of opposition to Brother Francis' "Search after God," but suggestive to such minds as seem to be disturbed in their equanimous harmonies on account of the unique course he seems to be pursuing in search of his object. We can see no reason why he may not take any course he deems successful.

He asks us all a fair question at the head of his late articles, such as:

"Is there any work, either in nature or act, that does not point significantly to Individualized Man as its Author?"

And what if he does, and believes it himself? If such a proposition is not clear, certain, and self-evident,—founded upon science and philosophy, system and analogy,—why, then he can not demonstrate it; and if any can show up his error, is it not the duty of such to do so, if such error be considered mischievous to the public?

If such as one knows by scientifical and philosophical demonstration, that man himself,—a production of nature,—is not the author of that self, must not it be, by science and philosophy, that such knowledge exists? How easy, then, to demonstrate to scientific thinkers, that man is no more his own author, than nature is its own author. He himself consents that nature is self-existent, and hence can not be the production of any power behind itself.

He reasons well, or rather he cites to us many of nature's developments, as evidence of his positions being truthful. But it seems to us he should be aware that nature is a grand, germinal, elementary system, self-existently possessed of not only all forms in mathematical outline, in the perfection of development and mechanical organization, in principles individually identified, but as the Grand Archetype and Architect to unfold and develop all its innate principles to their ultimates; similar to all others of its types, from planets down to the tiniest organism in all its embodiment.

Your writer Paul recognized his "God" as a universal embodiment of all properties and qualities. He should, as all other investigators, scientifically developed, see that the germs of all organisms in existence contain innately, in principles, all their own special life-unfoldings, —and in seven grand orders, most clearly manifested in vegetation, when carried to its physical ultimate even.

Take, for example, an apple tree germ for its first grand order, containing like its Grand Archetype Nature, an embodiment of all its future unfolding possibilities. Its root is its second grand order of development; its stem or body its third; its branches the fourth; its leaves the fifth; its blossoms the sixth; and its fruit the seventh—including, of course, the new germs for continual propagation of the apple principle, till its elements are all organized in its surroundings.

Again: does that tiny organized, individualized life-power that builds those delicate coral structures, away down a hundred fathoms in the "deep, deep, sea," point very "significantly to man, as its author?"—or even does its mechanical work do so? We concede here a manifestation of mentality; but does man only exhibit the mental faculty? Is man the author of the first planet? Being, so far as our knowledge and experience extends, himself the child of one. Can the child be the author of its own mother?

Finally, permit us, your humble servants, (names are of no consequence) from our standpoint of science and philosophy, system and analogy, to warn all investigators of life's unfolding and developments, that the alphabet or key to it all will be found based in self-existent, eternal principles: that is, every organism in nature, from its own universal, elementary system to the minutest part and parcel thereof, is an eternal, individualized identity in form and outline, [illegible] sting themselves by No animated existence [illegible] ical link or medium of transition between the lower realms of life's unfoldings and man—since he is a grand aggregate of them all: as the fruit of the apple or other tree is the grand aggregated refinement of the entire capacities of production.

Remember this, that the monkey, including all of its species and varieties, is a self-existent, eternal monkey principle in its own identity, and can never be metamorphosed into anything else.

As the roots, stalk, etc., of a tree may serve as laboratorial agents for refining the elements of the future germs of its own species; so all these lower organisms are doing, to prepare elements for the development of the man principle. Search after God as you will, and rouse all the intellectuality on your planet in the hunt—all the better; agitation of the human mind unfolds its wisdom. We will add our counsel as we at all find opportunity through our co-worker and medium.

PHYSICAL MANIFESTATIONS.

Startling Developments in a New Quarter.

BROTHER JONES:—I trust any word of the work of "Spiritualism" from any part of the world, is of interest to every lover of the great and glorious truth.

The knowers (I will not say believers) are having a fine time here. Dr. Alexander and family are time-tried Spiritualists, but until very lately they have stood alone in this community.

In the Summer of 1870, Miss Georgia Mattock, of Cincinnati, a most amiable young lady and an excellent medium, visited at the doctor's family. Several private circles were then held, but there was not enough obtained to create excitement, but sufficient to agitate thought.

This winter she again came, and some of the young people as they could spare time from sleigh riding and other amusements, began to hold circles. At first I did not attend any, as the most that was obtained was raps, and some such manifestations, but soon the circles grew in interest,—books and other objects were carried around the room, instruments were played on, and the manifestations were altogether, as the circle considered, satisfactory. Several of the intelligent citizens began to inquire about it, and a few of the more curious to investigate, and all the circles a "tin horn" was set on the table. At first this was thrown off. Soon it was controlled and carried around the room. These manifestations were all had in the dark, and had it not been for the confidence each had in one another, of course they would not have been satisfactory to any.

On the night of Feb. 23rd, the invisibles gave us an exhibition of their power. I had not yet been present at any of their circles, as I had considerable work on hands, and did not need, as I thought, any proofs of Spiritualism.

On this evening, at a small circle, consisting of the medium, Miss Mattock, Mrs. Dr. Alexander, Mattie Price, a devout lady woman, and Biddy Lawler, the hired girl—four only—a large six-stop parlor organ was controlled, and played most beautifully. Some smaller instruments had been handled and played on before, but not such sweet music, as all agree, was made on the organ. This same evening, (Feb. 23rd) the medium went to Mr. Joseph Bennett's, and a circle was formed. At this circle, about ten o'clock several friends spoke for some time audibly through the hour. This was the beginning of a series of intensely interesting meetings.

On the evening of the 24th, another circle was held at the same place, at which very loud and distinct talking was had through the horn. Much of the time the language used by the young people, at which no one could avoid joining in the laugh; but there was also much that was beautiful.

On the 26th, another circle was formed at Dr. Alexander's, at which there was a great deal of good instruction. On this evening the spirit (I would say the medium's father) promised us for Monday evening, a debate on the San Domingo question, by intelligences on the other side. I should have said, that on the evening of the 24th, we were promised a lecture for the 26th, by John Moffatt, a Methodist minister. I thus give these names as they may be recognized by your readers. Those who debaters on the San Domingo question, were Abraham Lincoln, Scott, Harrison, Wm. Skinner, and Mr. Mattock,—or were to be. No circle was held on Sunday evening, as the band on the other side desired to rest, or that we should rest.

On Monday evening, Feb. 27th, a circle was formed at Dr. Alexander's. By this time there was much excitement in the community, and nearly every body wanted to see or hear. Mrs. Alexander, one of those good, enthusiastic, wholesouled women, that believes with all her might, mind and strength, and wants every body else to enjoy what is to her so enjoyable, permitted a few more to be present at the Monday evening circle. I have not time to report more than the circle was a failure, as long as these men stayed. The circle has been much abused by them since, but fortunately there are several belonging to the circle, who are not practical believers of the theory of non-resistance in the present undeveloped state of humanity, which fact tends to suppress much of the abuse. The controlling spirit on the other side, Wm. Anderson, was very much vexed at the failure, but controlled himself for some time, and told us that, owing to the disturbance we could not have our debate, as the debaters could not control, nor could we have some instructions promised from Mr. Moffatt on the Spiritualism of the Bible. Mr. Anderson, spoke for some time on the beauties of his spirit home. Had a circle on last Tuesday evening at Mr. Bennett's, and one on Friday at Mr. Carr's in the country. At all these the horn is controlled and talked through in a distinct audible voice, from two to three hours. We have now instituted a plan of developing circles, at which none are admitted only those designated by the spirit band, and are promised to have these manifestations in the light finally.

As might be expected, the "journey-men-soul servers," and "God's stump orators," are becoming enraged. And well they may, for we have gathered to the support of Spiritualism a great many good men and women, though they do not believe it; and several of the best people of the place,—people that they, the church-men, have tried to get into the church, have fairly, thoroughly and satisfactorily investigated these manifestations, and are now not only believers, but knowers, as they feel that there is no chance for human collusion in this thing. I will write you more if there are further developments.

If you find any item of any interest in this, you will please publish, and sailafy our "spirit band," as I write at their request.

BROTHER JONES:—I have read that question,—"Who are they?" as long as I can stand it without making some reply. I shall be indebted to you financially three dollars the first day of May, which debt I hope to cancel by the first of June, or before. Am a thousand times obliged for the accommodation. I was a trial subscriber, and when my three months' subscription had expired, would have done without my bread and butter, rather than the JOURNAL.

I love your way of dealing with error, and your plain, out-spoken manner. I love the truth and its defenders. Long may the JOURNAL live and prosper.

D. MANCHESTER.

Remarks:—Dear brother, it gives us great pleasure to receive such letters as yours. While we are carrying so heavy a burthen as is involved in giving credit to subscribers, it is cheering to know that our effort is appreciated, and that it is the intention of those who are indebted to us to pay at the very earliest moment possible.

None but mean, selfish men ever think of trumping up a blackguard's apology for not paying for a newspaper that he has received for a year, more or less, on credit. Nor does an honest man try to cheat a newspaper publisher out of a few week's time when he remits and orders his paper discontinued.

GOD DEALING WITH SLAVERY. Spirit Messages to Thomas Richmond, etc, Chicago: S. S. Jones, 1870.

Thomas Richmond was for many years one of the leading business men of Chicago. Our older citizens will remember that he and the late Charles Walker, for several years, virtually controlled the grain interest and the shipping interest of the city. Mr. Richmond was the father of the Board of Trade, and was very active in promoting all the business and commercial enterprises of the city. No man had a more correct and comprehensive understanding of the wants of our city, of its future, and of the extent and the resources of the vast fertile country, whose business must ever be tributary to Chicago, than Thomas Richmond. The first chapters of the book, which give, very briefly, the business history of the author, are worth far more than its cost. They are well worthy of the study of young men, for they showwhat integrity and persevering industry can accomplish.

The religious history of Mr. Richmond will interest all who knew him. Starting in life as a Presbyterian, he was for many years one of the most active and useful members of that church. Conceiving the idea that even the New School branch favored slavery, on coming to Chicago he refused to hand in his letter, and, after floundering around for some time, he became a Spiritualist. Here his old friends must part company with him, and for ourselves we must believe that the pretended communications to the author through sundry mediums, were inspired by the strong mind of Mr. Richmond himself, and that his subsequent letters to Mr. Lincoln and others were but a reproduction of his own clear and comprehensive views on the slavery question, in a more condensed and effective form. Accepting and thanking Mr. Richmond for his eminent services in the past, his old friends will cast the mantle of charity over the spiritual portion of his book.—Chicago Tribune, Dec. 13, 1870.

That this interesting book may come within the reach of all, Bro. Richmond has reduced the price one third. It now sells, firmly bound in cloth, for $1.00, postage, 12 cents; in elastic paper covers, 75 cents, postage, 6 cents. We are now filling orders at these prices.

CRITICISM ON THE THEOLOGICAL IDEA OF DEITY, by M. B. Craven.

The author of this valuable book, has directed us to reduce the price from $1 50 to $1 00, so that no one need be deprived of a knowledge of its contents. The book contains 317 pages, and was cheap enough at the old price, but we take pleasure in obeying the wishes of its wholesouled author, and will send the book to any address, postage paid, on receipt of $1.10. We clip the following from some of our exchanges who have noticed the work.

"In examining the various religious systems, the author displays much research, and brings together a large mass of citations. If they are to prove the insufficiency of any human conception of the Deity, and the inability of human language to adequately express his nature, we are content to let this criticism pass unchallenged."—The Age, Philadelphia, Jan. 12th, 1871.

"The author has evidently ranged through the broad fields of both ancient and modern literature, gleaning with an industrious hand."—Herald and Free Press, Jan. 12th.

"The book is evidently the production of a man of learning."—Sunday Dispatch, Jan. 15th.

"A search into its pages will surprise and instruct any one."—Banner of Light, Jan. 21st.

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL is the striking title of a handsome volume, from a Topeka, Kansas, press, the author being that well-known and fearless lecturer, Joel Moody. He undertakes, in this treatise, which we have not the space properly to analyze or discuss, to set forth the first principles of human action, and adds to the effort three lectures, viz: "Salvation and damnation before birth; or the scientific and theological method of salvation compared." "Sunday; its history, uses and abuses." "Prayer; the true and false method compared."

These are all living themes, treated by a living thinker, and discerned only by the mind of living people. They deserve calm, patient and reflective attention, which we have no doubt their importance and the high character of the author will secure for them.—Banner of Light.

Letter from W. B. Blain.

BROTHER JONES: Though your kind introduction to Brother Mee, I am to-day in this quiet, pleasant little inland town, where I find positive proof that Spiritualism and the JOURNAL are both alive, and doing each their respective work. Last evening I found the hall filled to overflowing, not alone with Spiritualists, but churchmen and divines even, all anxious to hear the truth and obtain some positive evidence that their loved ones buried were still alive, and did return. Gave them two lectures and twenty-six tests of actual spirit presence, after the lectures. I think they were interested, from the fact that they stood closely mass in the aisles, through the lecture, and after the meeting was dismissed, none seemed willing to leave, but wanted more tests, and I promised to visit them again.

That they are alive and active, with heart and soul in the cause, can be proven by the fact, that, although few in number, they pass no hat around for dimes to pay expenses, but have funds in their treasury, and give freely. On every table I met the familiar face of the JOURNAL.

At Crown Point we were met, even in the car, by that whole-souled pioneer of Spiritualism, Bro. Luther, who welcomed us to his home, where his gifted wife made us feel at rest, and among friends,—not of forms and ceremonies, but of true hearts.

At Lowell, the same hand of welcome was extended by Brother and Sister Mee, and others whose names though forgotten, their smile of welcome never will be. God bless them all!—we shall be glad to meet them again.

Though of ourself nothing, we hope by angel help to do some little good and help roll on the car of humanity triumphantly over all orthodox bigotry.

Lowell, Indiana.

Letter from Henry A. Beach.

BROTHER JONES:—I have for a long time felt it to be my duty to do something toward paying up the amount of my indebtedness to you for the JOURNAL, which continues to make its weekly visits to my family until we have come to look upon it as a friend whose presence we can not dispense with.

I have at length found steady employment, but as I get very moderate wages, and have a great many demands upon my rather meagre purse, I have concluded that the only way in which I can pay you at present, will be by installments from week to week until the old score is settled, and the paper paid for another year in advance. I know you are lenient toward those who try to be just and believe that you will not object to my paying you thus. You will therefore please find inclosed fifty cents, which you can credit to my account, as my first installment.

I can not tell you how highly I value your paper, nor how priceless I consider the principles it advocates, and if I had the means, the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL should send its beams of truth and gleams of comfort into many a household in this city where I believe it would be read, and in time appreciated, and I here feel impressed to pledge myself as I write to you that if the spirit world will place the means in my power, I will use them freely in circulating the truth as contained in the JOURNAL, and in extending a knowledge of Spiritualism all over the land.

I am now doing all that I can, but it seems to me to be so little, and the way is so hedged up, I can not feel too grateful for my own delivery from the bondage of orthodoxy and creeds, nor for the many hungering and thirsting after spiritual food, and a more open communion with the spirit world.

May the angels bless you, Brother Jones, and prosper the JOURNAL, in the prayer of your friend and brother in the cause of truth.

H. BEACH.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

Remarks:—Dear brother, we profess to do by others as we would they should do unto us.

We receive with gratitude remittances for dues, however small. Many who owe us would do well to imitate your example. Justice demands that they should do so. We really need the money our due, and hope each reader will examine his or her account with the JOURNAL, and remit, even if it be but fifty cents at a time.

HARRY BASTIAN.

Letter from Bell A. Chamberlain.

DEAR JOURNAL:—I wish to inform you, and through you the public, of the wonderful exhibition of spirit power through the mediumship of Harry Bastian. He has been giving the skeptical in this place a chance to investigate, and the friends of the cause assurances which make assurance doubly sure. The committee was chosen to tie him securely to the chair, which was then placed by the table upon which the instruments were placed for the use of the invisibles. Almost immediately after the tying, voices were heard through the trumpet, bells were rung, and tamborines beaten with vigor, the mouth organ played upon, the guitar floated, or rather whirled near us in the front row with such a rapidity as to cause us to draw back for fear of a smart blow from it, was raised to the ceiling above us, struck upon the floor with energy, thrown upon the table, and then, after each member of the committee had looked to his fastenings, and pronounced him as they left him, they would untie him in a less space of time than they took to tie him. Then the spirits would quickly secure him so that none of the audience could untie him.—In this condition they would perform wonderful feats, then untie him in short space of time, retie him hand and foot, securely to the chair, place him on the table, put upon his head tamborine and bells, then call the committee to examine the fastenings, after which, they would put him on the floor again. Once the spirits were playing upon the mouth-organ, speaking through the trumpet, and whispering to a little girl at the same time. Solid iron rings were placed upon his arm, and removed again quickly, and put upon his head,—the guitar, tamborine and bells making music during the time. His coat was taken off while he was tied, and in fact there were so many feats performed that I have not space to mention them.

Mr. Bastian is a natural medium, and in private a perfect gentleman; impressing all who meet him with his purity and honesty.

These manifestations, following a course of lectures which were delivered through my mediumship—which had arrested the attention of the public—seem to be the rivets which should fasten the argument. Clear Lake has such an excitement as the occidental villages of Iowa seldom get. May the mediums be rapidly multiplied, is my earnest prayer.

Yours for the truth,

MRS. BELL A. CHAMBERLAIN.

MEDIUMS' DIRECTORY.

The Religio-Philosophical Journal being an especial friend to all true mediums, will hereafter publish a complete directory, giving the place of all professional mediums, so far as advised upon the subject. This will afford better facilities for investigators to learn of the location of mediums, and at the same time increase their patronage.

Mediums will do well to advise us from time to time, that we may keep their place of residence correctly registered.

☞ It is a lamentable fact that some mediums so forget their self respect as to speak evil of other mediums, not unfrequently even of those who are far their superiors. The names of such persons will be dropped from this Register so soon as we have evidence conclusive of their indulging in such unkindness.

It should be borne in mind that professional visiting mediums carry conditions with themselves—so to speak—which either destroy the power of spirits to manifest to certain persons, another battery to others—all having their friends, and justly so, too, and all equally honest and useful in their place.

Artificial Somnambulism.

The author of the above named book, is a philosopher of large experience and great merit.

In this work he treats of the philosophy of mind as demonstrated by practical experiments during the last twenty years. No work has ever been published which so thoroughly demonstrates many popular theories to be unfounded, and fallacious; and at the same time gives a rational theory for phenomena manifested.

DR. FAHNESTOCK is a thorough believer in spirit-communion, and teaches in this work the modus operandi, to a demonstration.

The following is the table of contents of this valuable work.

CHAP. I.—HISTORICAL SURVEY. Mesmer not the discoverer of the state—His theory of it—Its examination by the French commissioners—Their conclusions—The author's remarks.

CHAP. II.—Of the causes which have retarded the progress of the science.

CHAP. III.—Of the conditions necessary for the production of the somnambulic state, with instructions how to enter it, etc. I.—Of the instructor or operator. II.—Of the patient. III.—Instructions. IV.—Of the sensations experienced by those who enter this state. V.—Of their awaking.

CHAP. IV.—Theory of this state.

CHAP. V.—Of the somnambulic or proper sleep. I.—Of a partial state of Artificial Somnambulism. ♀

CHAP. VI.—Phreno-Somnambulism.

CHAP. VII.—Of the senses: I.—Motion; or, the power to move.

CHAP. VIII.—Of the functions of the faculties. I.—Consciousness. 2.—Attention. III.—Perception. IV.—Memory. V.—Association. VI. and VII.—Likes and Dislikes. VIII.—Judgment. IX.—Imagination X.—Will.

CHAP. IX.—Of the peculiar functions of perception in the different faculties while in a natural state. I.—Of the peculiar functions of perception when in a state of Artificial Somnambulism. II.—The functions considered when in a state of Artificial Somnambulism. 1.—Consciousness. 2.—Attention. 3.—Perception. 4.—Memory. 5.—Associations. 6 and 7.—Likes and Dislikes. 8.—Judgment. 9.—Imagination. 10.—Will.

CHAP. X.—Of reading or knowing the mind. I.—Illustration. II.—Illustrations. Theory of Dr. Collyer. Mental alchemy or electrifying.

CHAP. XI. I.—Of the identity of other mysteries with this state. II.—Of the science of feeling. III.—Of clairvoyant magicians of Egypt. III.—Of the "mysterious lady." IV.—Of the early mirrors. First earth glass. Second earth glass. V.—Second sight. VI.—Spectomania.

CHAP. XII.—Trans-position of the senses.

CHAP. XIII.—Natural sleep.

CHAP. XIV.—Natural Somnambulism. I.—Trance.

CHAP. XV.—Of Intuition.

CHAP. XVI.—Presentiment or foreknowledge.

CHAP. XVII.—Of Interior previsions. II. of exterior prevision. III.—Prophetic dreams. IV.—Witchcraft.

CHAP. XVIII.—Sympathy. I.—Clairvoyance. Clairvoyance at a distance.

CHAP. XIX.—Of the sense of hearing.

CHAP. XX.—Of the senses of smell and taste.

CHAP. XXI.—Of the sense of feeling.

CHAP. XXII.—Of the sense of motion. Of their physical strength.

CHAP. XXIII.—Of the influence of Artificial Somnambulism on the system. I.—Of its influence upon a healthy subject. II.—Of the influence of Artificial Somnambulism upon diseased subjects.

CHAP. XXIV.—Artificial Somnambulism considered as a therapeutic agent.

CHAP. XXV.—Of the kinds of disease cured while in this state. I.—Chorea, or St. Vitus's dance. II.—Epilepsy. III.—Dyspepsia. IV.—Intermittent fever. V.—Fever. VI.—Case. VII.—Inflammatory rheumatism. THE CELEBRATED

CRAIG MICROSCOPE

Is an optical wonder; reveals the thousands of hidden wonders of Nature; is of permanent use and practical availability, combining instruction with amusement, and never losing its interest. It magnifies

TEN THOUSAND TIMES,

a power equal to other microscopes of many times its cost. Reveals countless little worlds all around us, teaching with life, which, to the naked eye must forever remain a sealed book—as Eels in Vinegar, Animals in Water, Cheese Mites, Sugar and Rich Insects, Milk Globules, Claws and Hairs of Insects, Hundreds of Eyes in the Single eye of a Fly, Dust of a Butterfly's Wings to be perfectly formed feathers, the much talked of Trichina Spiralis or Pork Worm, which was first discovered in America with this Microscope.

It is of indispensable value to professional men, to teachers and to students, but nowhere is it of greater value than on the family table, within the reach of every member. It will detect yourself, your children and friends during the long winter evenings. It will show you adulterations or uncleanliness of various kinds in food, as sugar, tea, bread, meat, &c.

It is of Inestimable Value to the Farmer

in examining insects which prey upon his crops. The power of a $50 microscope is magnified, and so simple in construction that any child can use it understandingly and with appreciation.

A Beautiful Present, Elegant, Instructive, Amusing, and Cheap. Over 60,000 sold.

During the past six years its worth has been testified to by Thousands of Scientific Men, Farmers, School Teachers, Students, Physicians, Heads of Families, and others.

TERMS OF THE

Religio-Philosophical Journal.

$3,00 per year; $1,50—6 months, $1;—3mo.

☞ Fifty Cents for Three Months on trial TO NEW SUBSCRIBERS.

In making remittances for subscriptions, always procure a draft on New York, or POST-OFFICE MONEY ORDER, if possible. Where neither of these can be procured, send the money, but always in a REGISTERED LETTER. The registration fee has been reduced to FIFTEEN CENTS, and the present registration system has been found by the postal authorities to be virtually an absolute protection against losses by mail. ALL POSTMASTERS are obliged to register letters when requested to do so.

All subscriptions remaining unpaid more than six months, will be charged at the rate of $3.50 per year.

PAPERS are forwarded until an explicit order is received by the Publisher for their discontinuance, and until payment of all arrearages is made, as required by law.

No names nevermore on the subscription books without the first payment in advance.

SUBSCRIBERS are particularly requested to note the expiration of their subscriptions, and to forward what is due for the ensuing year, with or without further reminder from this office

NEWSPAPER DECISIONS.

1. Any person who takes a paper regularly from the post-office—whether directed to his name or another's, or whether he has subscribed or not—is responsible for the payment.

2. If a person orders his paper discontinued, he must pay all arrearages, or the publisher may continue to send it until payment is made, and collect the whole amount,—whether the paper is taken from the office or not.

3. The courts have decided that refusing to take newspapers and periodicals from the post-office, or removing and leaving them uncalled for, is PRIMA FACIE evidence of intentional fraud.

LOOK TO YOUR SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Upon the margin of each paper, or upon the wrapper, will be found a statement of the time to which payment has been made. For instance, if John Smith has paid to Dec. 10th, 1870, it will be mailed, "Smith J.—10 Dec.—0." The 0 means 1870. If he has only paid to Dec. 10th, 1869, it would stand thus: Smith J.—10 Dec.—9, or perhaps, in some cases, the last two figures for the year, as 70 for 1870, or 69 for 1869.

☞ Thoseending money to this office for the JOURNAL, should be careful to state whether it be a renewal, or a new subscription, and write all proper names plainly.

A SEARCH AFTER GOD.

NUMBER XXXIX.

Peculiar Manifestations—Schools in the Spheres—A Beautiful Law—The Books of Earth Reproduced in the Spirit World, and How—Newspapers Here Republished There—The Congressional Globe—Spiritual Congress—No Book that Emanates from God—The Third Book between all Antagonistic Books—Spirit Photography—A Grand Work about to be Inaugurated.

Spirit—In the spirit spheres, we find some strange manifestations of power, that the denizens of earth have but little thought of. How true it is that knowledge is power. How grand, the idea that when, perhaps, millions of years shall have passed away, we will be able to execute that which we thoroughly understand. The mathematicians have many ingenious devices and rules whereby they calculate the time of a planet's revolution in its orbit, its distance from the sun, its size, density, and many other particulars. These rules have been learned by close observation and thorough investigation. The world to-day are indebted to the past for a foundation on which to stand in the investigation of the beautiful problems connected with the government of the universe. The chemists of the Spirit World are far in advance of those of earth, and the power that they possess is truly remarkable. It would be well to consider some of the marvelous doings of those connected with the sciences here. But where shall we commence, and to what shall we allude?

Lucretus—Do spirits study chemistry here, and devote the same attention to it as those of earth?

Spirit—Certainly. In the Spirit World are schools of different grades, where all can receive instructions in those sciences they desire to understand. Many of the books of earth are re-published in the Spirit World, in order to note the progress that is being made in the various phases of life.

Lucretus—Is each one reprinted there?

Spirit—In one sense it is. We get the reprint of each book by a peculiar process, by placing, as it were, certain elements en rapport with it. A spirit when it desires to learn the thoughts of the mortals of earth, by placing himself en rapport with them, can read their most inmost designs and desires. The process of taking a photograph by the children of earth is a peculiar one. A negative, as it is called, is first taken, and the action of the light transmitted through it, imprints your likeness on a card. There is a species of photography in the Spirit World, through the instrumentality of which, all books can be reproduced. Visit one of the photographic galleries of earth; examine the negative, as it is called, through which the action of light produces your own image, and you have a faint idea of the manner by which the literature of the earth sphere is reproduced in the Spirit World. This is a grand process. I can not explain it to you now.

Lucretus—Well, I am astonished. I supposed that all this was done through the instrumentality of a God.

Spirit—Not by any means. But I must not dismiss so soon the method of reproducing in the Spirit World the literature of earth. Now, I desire to say, that the prominent works of literature, all of any value, are reproduced. Our libraries would not be complete without them.

Lucretus—What about papers?

Spirit—Now, be patient with me. Certain leading papers published on earth are reproduced in the Spirit World, and read there with great relish. The Spiritual Congress, composed of all the leading patriots of the United States who have long since passed away, together with wise men from other countries, are necessarily compelled to read the views of the children of earth, and therefrom they can judge correctly the true aspect of affairs. The daily proceedings of the Congress at Washington, are reported to this Spiritual Congress. How is this done? Attach your negative, as it is called, to a card, and in a moment's time, your true likeness is obtained. Through a process somewhat analagous, a newspaper printed on earth, is reproduced in the Spirit World. So expeditiously is this done, that the work of producing the separate editions are regarded as simultaneous. Really, if the children of earth think their works can not be produced in the Spirit World, they are greatly mistaken. This process requires the skill of advanced spirits. All can not do it—indeed but few can comprehend its nature. The establishments for this purpose, are en rapport with those on the material plane, and work harmoniously with them.

Lucretus—Then God has nothing to do with this work?

Spirit—Nothing. The skill of man is only required. His ingenuity devised the scheme, but not for some time after the printing process was fully established on earth. This was discovered by a circle of spirits, who had been at work for a long time to devise a process whereby the scenes of earth could be transmitted to material prepared for the purpose, in the Spirit spheres. The thought that this feat could be accomplished, was induced by observing the process of taking common photographs. The negative could imprint on a card a life-like representation—why not, then, some means be employed whereby the pages of a book might be transmitted to another page, the same as your likeness on one plate can be transmited to another? The process, like all things, is simple when understood, but I can not find language with which I could explain its nature in full, and I only state that the fact exists. The power to reproduce a shadow of everything that exists in earth-life, so it will be tangible to the denizens of the Spirit World, now exists, and great good is being accomplished thereby. As communications between the nations of earth are opened, and international traffic occurs, a friendly and more fraternal spirit is exercised, and often great good secured by both nations. In this beautiful process of reproducing literature in the Spirit World, spirits become interested in the affairs of earth. For the benefit of the Spiritual Congress, the Globe, at Washington is reproduced, also the leading papers there. Only certain papers are allowed to be republished, and that permission is granted by the guardian circle of the higher spheres.

Lucretus—Allowed to be reproduced—only certain ones allowed in the spirit spheres? Why, I thought you had freedom in the Spirit World?

Spirit—There is freedom here. There are restraints, also. As long as there exists one being better and more intelligent than those below him, there will be restraints exercised. There is not perfect freedom in the Spirit World. That would imply a license to do wrong. Ah! there are rules and regulations there as well as on the earth.

Lucretus—In the Spirit Word, is there any book that claims to have emanated from God himself?

Spirit—Certainly. There is the Bible. It has been reproduced, and there are many here who believe its superior divine origin. That, however, is not of long duration. The errors of earth-life do not inhere within the mind long in the Summer-land. The opportunity of becoming acquainted with its true character, is far better here than in earth-life. The literature of the Spirit World is of that character that affords excellent opportunities to arrive at the truth.

Lucretus—In the reproduction of the books and newspapers of the spheres of earth, do not many find their way there that are of no practical utility.

Spirit—This reproduction requires great skill, and only those works that are required are republished. In the literature of the spirit world we find histories of the nations of earth, the principal events of their govarament, the extent of their progress, etc., in book form, as written by spirits who devote their attentions to historical matters as connected with the various nations. These works are compared with those written on earth, and the discrepancies of the two make the contents for a third book. Between all histories of nations as published on earth and in the spheres, there is a third book, that points out the discrepancies in the statements, and shows wherein the error consists. Two authors may discuss some subject connected with chemistry, astronomy, or metaphysics, and their statements conflict. Some one who has long lived in spirit life, will examine both, and point out the errors of each, and do it so lucidly that his statements are regarded as being correct. In our literature there will always be found this third book, and it comes forth stamped with the insignia of authority.

Lucretus—It does seem to me there should be a reciprocal action; we have the literature of the Spirit World, as well as you that of earth.

Spirit—That can only be done on a small scale now. A few things only can be transmitted to material prepared for the purpose. It would be useless to give the children of earth the books published in the Spirit World; they could not comprehend their contents. It is often the case that a likeness of a spirit can be impressed on the sensitized plate of the artist. This is a peculiar process, and requires excellent conditions in order to execute it successfully. The artist who receives these impressions does not fully comprehend the position he occupies. He is taking two, perhaps more, pictures at the same time, and there may be some name imprinted on the plate. The plate of the artist has its peculiar aura, as you well know, which is nothing but a species of light which the combination of elements is always producing. This light or emanation is regarded as the sphere of each object. The sensitized plate of the artist has this peculiar emanation, and in order to imprint thereon a name the position it is to assume is rendered negative, and then the spiritual magnetism only remains, or in that particular place, or the spirit of the plate,—for all organized objects have a spirit, as it were,—which will be more fully explained hereafter. The magnetism of the sensitized plate is positive to the spirit, and it is only by rendering it negative, that it will receive the impress of spiritual things.

Lucretus—Then the likeness of spirits can be taken on the earth sphere?

Spirit—Yes, a simple, natural process, yet one that requires great skill and perfect conditions. The action of electricity, as manifested in lightning, permits of some wonderful experiments. A spirit often can succeed in imprinting his own likeness on many objects in nature during a flash of lightning. It was by this method that strange figures and scenes are made to appear on window glass and grave stones. The time is not far distant when the scenery of the Spirit World will be presented by the children of earth through an ingenious process already perfected but not yet fully in operation. The connection between the mundane and supermundane spheres under its operations will be more complete. This invention was made by a scientific spirit in noticing the wonderful experiments that were being made through the instrumentality of a flash of lightning. Now communications are fully established with the children of earth, and from this time on, it will become more frequent and perfect in its operations. In disclosing to the children of earth the scenes of the Spirit World, we hope thereby to inspire them with higher and nobler aspirations, and drive away the mists of ignorance and superstition. In the reproduction of the literature of earth, in the Spirit World, wise ends are subserved and much good accomplished thereby. In all these works we recognize only the action of individualized intelligences. I desire to convince you that with all operations that are seen and comprehended, only individualized intelligences are connected, while with the invisible, unseen and the mysterious, the mind is ever inclined to attach thereto a God. In tracing these wonderful operations, I do not find any God connected with them. The moment, however, that something arises that I cannot explain, you instantly startle me with the cry that a God is connected therewith. Now, this is the obstacle that I meet with. Many things I cannot explain; but then I know that there are spirits who have lived through a duration of time that the mind cannot comprehend, and who are invisible to me, and stand in the same relation to me that I do to the children of earth. Now go with me. Yonder is an assemblage of earth's children. They are to take passage on that steamer, which will be sunk, and all on board perish. In all this vast assemblage there is only one that can be so influenced that he will remain. He is in perfect health now. I will with a circle of spirits send an influence on his brain that will make him very sick. See him vomit now. He staggers like a drunken man, and his friends consider him in a dangerous condition. We will keep him so until the boat starts. Finally the steamer leaves, and when this man reads an account of its destruction, he considers his safety providential, and ascribes it to a God. Our operations were unseen by him. Could he have seen us he would have found no God connected therewith. This, then, is the reason of a belief in the existence of a Deity. The operations of Spirits in the higher spheres are unobserved by those in the lower, and they are always inclined to ascribe a God thereto. You find, Lucretus, in the Spirit World, constant activity. There is no thrumming of golden harps, psalm-singing, and shouting praises to any God sitting on a throne. In our explanations of those things, we have only desired to show you the wonderful operations of spirits. And now, amidst the many beauties of the supermundane spheres, let your aspirations be upward, and as you pass along, progress in knowledge, ever bear in mind that there are struggling ones beneath you who need attention, and in proportion to your assistance to them, you will aid yourself. Life is a grand archway, ever enlarging and growing more beautiful if your acts are of the right character. Look at yonder beautiful villa. There, pendant from a pinnacle, is the life archway of its inmate. Those flowers are all emblematical of the incidents of his earth life, and when you have progressed a little further, you can interpret their meaning. Oh, ever bear in mind, children of earth, that you are constructing an archway that will bloom with flowers emblematical of all you do. Believe me, that the secret acts of life are there; they stand out in bold relief,—all can see them. No God placed them there; no God arranged it so that such would be the case. Those, who with stolid indifference to the welfare of others pass through life, are selfish and exacting,—it is not until they live partially for others as well as self, that they can progress. I would imbue all with lofty aspirations, pure thoughts, and high resolves. I would cheer the despondent, aid those who require it, and in so doing, while blessing others, bless myself. You, proud, haughty, aristocratic nabob, whose soul is clothed in a garb of selfishness, must be changed, and your soul grandly illuminated with a desire to benefit others. Those who accumulate wealth and let the dollars rust in the vault, are simply dwarfing their own natures, cramping their own energies, and sinking in the scale of existence. Each one elevates or debases himself. No God does one or the other.

Give us another "Church around the Corner."

At Newburgh, New York, a church organist committed suicide. Poor fellow! he was weary of the cares and toils of this world, and under the insane impulses of his nature, destroyed the vital spark of life. Through the instrumentality of the church organ, for years he had given a holy expression to the music, and under the influence thereof, the minister felt that he was much nearer heaven. This church organist was a sinner,—a pious sinner,—who was used, as the monkey used the paw of the cat, to serve the interests of God. No doubt the songs he blew, the notes he touched, and the sweet expression that he gave to the solemn chants and lively airs, had an elevating effect on the minds of those who listened to him each Sabbath. But he died. Could he have committed suicide and lived; killed himself and still been a walking human being, with eyes to see, ears to hear, and a mind that could feel, he certainly would have had his misfortunes and pity alternately excited, over the feeling that his demise created. Poor fellow, he died, and, as no suicide can enter the kingdom of heaven, no minister of the gospel of this town would consent to preach his funeral sermon. Unfortunately for him, he committed suicide in a town where there was no "church round the corner," with a decent minister of the gospel to utter the last solemn rites over the dead body of one of earth's children. We pity Newburgh. Her ministers are a sickly class, devoid of justice, common sense, or decency, and have forgotten that "charity covereth a multitude of sins." Such "ministers of the gospel" will sometime see the need of charity. Now, with their fat salaries, and the blood of Jesus, which they have patented, they think "they are lord of all they survey," and they will not officiate at the funeral of one who has committed suicide. Oh, for a "church round the corner" in Newburgh, N. Y.

A Radical Club.

There is a radical club in Indianapolis, Indiana, which is doing a good work in behalf of the liberal cause. At a late meeting, the hall was crowded, and the following resolution was discussed:

"Resolved, That the various churches calling themselves Christian have done more good than evil in the world."

After various speeches for and against the resolution, Mr. Job Combs concluded with the following remarks:

This question demands the most serious attention of every friend of truth and progress. We live in an age that demands of every honest, independent man the bold and fearless declaration of his true sentiments upon every question that involves the freedom and progress of humanity.

The affirmative say that Christianity has done more to civilize and moralize the world than all other influences combined. I meet this with the assertion that but for the civilizing influences of art, of science and philosophy, of poetry and music, the world would, for all the church has done or would or could do, be no more virtuous or enlightened than in the days of Charlemagne. Look at the nations that are wholly under the dominion of her church and her heaven-ordained ministers, political or ecclesiastical, but which have not enjoyed the humanizing influences to which I have referred.

Let your mind's eye rest upon the Emerald Isle, and tell me what you see. There are Bishops and Priests and Prelates in plenty. There are churches innumerable, from which prayers ascend continually. But what is the condition of the children of our Father who art in Heaven? They are groping in darkness. They are crushed by oppression. They are dying with want and disease, that the lordly drones of the church and state may live in ease and luxury. Look at our own country before the war. See the down-trodden slave toiling for naught. His mind shrouded in compelled ignorance; his body bent with toil unrequitted; his back seamed by the lash of the cruel driver. Behold his master, clothed in purple, and faring sumptuously; the companion of statesmen and divines, perhaps himself a member of Congress or preacher of the gospel of Christ. Where was the Christian's God, the God of miracles and special providences? Why does He not appear and end such fearful wrongs? No; the Bible and the church upheld slavery until the Abolitionists, who were nearly all Infidels, raised such a clamor about the ears of the American people that they could not longer tolerate it in common decency.

It is claimed that Christianity promotes love and fraternity. I answer by pointing to the endless number of petty sects, and ask what has sown among them the bitter seeds of discord, strife, and partisan hatred so profusely? The adherents of Christianity have crumbled into five hundred sects and parties, each spitting the fires of damnation at the others. Each sect claims to have the exact truth and living faith, and therefore all the other and all outsiders are in the bonds of error and iniquity. Thus each sect damns all the rest, and is itself damned by four hundred and ninety-nine others. Glorious prospect this for this life! I pity these victims of such a stupid theory. Science, philosophy, and rational thought is rapidly reforming theology and cooling sectarian zeal. Once the damnation of infants was a cardinal doctrine of the church. Now that is repudiated as barbarous. We can all well remember when a belief in a lake of eternal hell fire was the test of orthodoxy. Now it is vulgar to speak of anything so crude. Eternal compunction of conscience has superseded it. The church once believed in the six literal days of creation. Now there were six indefinite periods of creative development.

Theology has made many concessions to science, but she has only fairly begun to concede. She cannot stop till every vital dogma is surrendered, and she accepts in their stead the revelations of science and truths of philosophy. I do not hope that the poor, narrow sectarianist will appreciate this prediction, for he is wholly absorbed in the effort to escape an imaginary hell, which, if he is to be his own judge, he deserves, and secure an unmerited salvation in a selfish heaven. But the freed mind and expanded soul will understand me.

As the world moves on, new ideas, fresh inspirations and grand discoveries quicken the energies of humanity, while new and glorious revelations, of moral and spiritual truth come, to keep alive faith in the All-Father, and perfect man in righteousness. Man was not made for a fixed residence in the realms of space or kingdom of thought. All over his constitution is written the stirring word "Progress." Consign him to the realms of the damned, and by virtue of his God-given nature, he at once sets on foot schemes for the improvement of the place and the amelioration of its inhabitants.

And perchance some Sir John Franklin would discover a northwest passage to the world of bliss. Send him to your orthodox heaven, and his overflowing humanity will lead him to explore the regions adjacent, with a view to colonizing the fugitives from hell that should escape over the underground railroad they would be sure to construct. The idea of Lloyd Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and Theodore Parker being kept quiet in heaven, while hell lay just in sight, is preposterous. Man's career is onward and upward forever. A new dispensation is coming to take the place of the old. It comes like a rolling flood, bearing on its muscular bosom the ruins of the temple of error, with all its old creeds and systems of despotism, political and ecclesiastical.

To Whom it may Concern, Only.

DEAR FRIEND: It is a painful task to be compelled to appeal to your integrity for the little amount which you owe the undersigned, for the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL.

If it was not justly due, and if he had not waited upon you for a long time, and made great sacrifices, to give you an opportunity to pay it without embarrassing you by so doing, he would not so urgently press you for it now. But he does need the money, and justice, it is not doubted, will prompt you to remit it to him in a registered letter, or by a post-office money order, taking the expense of doing so out of the amount due, which you will readily estimate from your account to be found on the yellow slip pasted on the wrapper or margin of each number of the paper.

You owe since the —— day of ——, A. D. 18—, (supply the day, month, and year from the yellow slip referred to).

The publisher will willingly continue to send you the JOURNAL on credit, on receipt of present arrearages and discount the extra fifty cents usually charged for each year's delinquency, if promptly paid on receipt of this number of the JOURNAL.

This appeal is in deep earnest to those who are one year and over in arrears for the JOURNAL, but at the same time in the spirit of kindness and fraternal regard.

S. S. JONES, Publisher and Proprietor.

Mrs. Robinson's Mediumship.

There is probably no medium living who is doing a more successful work in healing the sick, and in business matters, than Mrs. A. H. Robinson, of Chicago.

She is prescribing for the sick, by letter, in all parts of the country. A second prescription is seldom required. The most desperate cases of disease yield under the spiritual treatment given through her mediumship.

There are at the present time a great number of most excellent mediums in Chicago, and there never was a time when new converts were being made to Spiritualism so rapidly as now.

Willis, the Spirit Artist.

A. D. Willis, whose gallery is situated at No 136 South Clark street, in the immediate vicinity of the office of the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL JOURNAL, is doing a fine business in taking spirit likenesses.

We exerted ourselves to get him to come to this city, and finally succeeded—another success. Church folks as well as Spiritualists throng his gallery, and get good likenesses of those so-called dead friends and loved ones.

Bigots and opposers of physical manifestations are confounded. He charges five dollars for a result, and nothing if no spirit picture appears upon the plate.

Hindoo New Testament.

The stereotype plates of the BHAGVAT-GEETA are completed, and the work will be ready for delivery to the many who are ordering them next week. It will be a beautiful volume, very attractive, and such as every family will be pleased to place upon the shelves of their library or upon the center-table. Indeed, it is our intention to make it a beautiful book.

This work was sold in England by subscription for four pounds sterling, bound in paper. We shall sell it for $1 25, in most beautiful gilt backed magenta muslin binding; postage 16 cts. Please send in your orders speedily, and get a rare book.

Isaac Paden.

The above-named veteran, of Woodhull, Illinois, received Letters of Fellowship from the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL SOCIETY, constituting him a "Regular Minister of the Gospel," on the 6th of May.

He is a bold defender of the Spiritual Philosophy unadulterated with creeds and dogmas of faith. Having had much experience in that line in his younger days, he finds it in keeping with common sense to dispense with them now.

letter of Fellowship.

The Religio-Philosophical Society, in accordance with law, granted letters of fellowship and ordination, authorizing the solemnizing of marriages, etc. to Dr. Abbs Lord Palmer, of New Boston, Ill., on the 10th day of May, 1871.

Dr. Entwistle.

The above named, well recommended healing medium has located directly opposite the office of the JOURNAL. He knows where the great centre of Spiritualism in this city is, and has wisely procured an office near it. His card will be found in another column.

—The great current of human thought, that has been frozen over for ages, is at length breaking up under the powerful rays of the great sun of science, and all the ice is running at once.

—The natural wants of men are few, simple, and easily supplied—his artificial ones, infinite.

—Live not for self alone, but multiply thyself. He who lives for self, has a single friend. He who lives for a hundred others also, has a hundred and one.—S. A. Merrill.

Personal and Local.

—J. R. Francis' next lecture at Crosby's Music Hall will be on this subject: "The sixty-one thousand ministers of the gospel—their morality and immorality, and the effects of their teachings on humanity." Every Spiritualist should hear this lecture.

—Mrs. S E. Warner has been lecturing in Putnam Conn., where she is much liked.

—Mrs. M. S. Hoadley speaks in Lunenburg the second Sunday in May; third Sunday in New London, Conn; during September and October in Lynn.

—Geo. F. Clark ("Yankee Ned") the sailor speaker, can be addressed at No. 2, Newhall street, Lynn, Mass. He will visit Maine soon.

—Thomas Gales Forster lectures at Salem, Mass., during May.

—At Higgensville, Ill., the spirits actually talk in audible voices during the night or day, through the mediumship of Mr. Reece.

—We had the pleasure of a call this week from Dr. Bland, late editor and publisher of the Northwestern Farmer, Indianapolis, Ind. He is a thorough going Spiritualist, a gentleman, and a writer of much ability. We have long been familiar with his writings.

—D. W. Hull is in Fallowfield, Penn, to hold a discussion with a Methodist minister. He will be in Thompson, Ohio, May 10th and 21st; Wyandotte Mich., May 23rd and 28th. He will answer calls to lecture for June and July. He says he is healing everything he touches. No cure; no pay.

—Dr. Wm. J. Young, 97 Christopher street, New York, keeps our paper on sale, and our friends in that city can, if they desire, order any book on our list from him.

—Hon. Thomas Richmond has been spending the winter at Beverly, N. J., engaged in preparing the matter for another book. He has now returned to Chicago, and we have this week had the pleasure of a call from him. His thousands of friends and acquaintances all over the country will be happy to know that he still retains good health and unabated zeal in the cause of Spiritualism.

—Dr. Blain, who, a few years ago, was actively at work in the field as a lecturer, is now about to start forth again. He sees and describes spirits, gives some wonderful tests, besides is an excellent lecturer.

—Mrs. A. Crooker has taken rooms at 179 West Madison street. She is a healer and clairvoyant.

—Mrs. Jennie Ferris, the well known physical medium, will at the close of her engagement at Memphis go to St. Louis.

—J. M. Allen has been lecturing at Pepperell, Mass.

—Frederick Hyren, who claims to be in possession of the apostolic gift, has prepared a new edition of his autobiography, and the new dispensation, as revealed to him.

—The Troy Conference expelled Rev. H. Meeker, of North Granville, after convicting him of adultery.

—We learn that one of the professors of the Auburn, (N. Y.) Theological Seminary has been compelled to leave the state on account of too great intimacy with the sisters of the church.

—Brother Henry D. Jackson, of Quincy, Ill., writes us a note speaking in high terms of the mediumship of Mrs. Maud Lord.

—Fannie T. Young started West on the 15th. She will answer calls to lecture, attend funerals, etc. Address her in care of E G. Prentice, Hampshire, Ill.

—When you go to Louisville, Ky., and want good comfortable hotel accommodations at reasonable prices, go to the Spurrier House.

—Inquiries are made for Frank L. Thayer, the medium. We are unable to reply, not having heard from him for many weeks.

—Thank you, Bell A. Chamberlain, and one hundred others who have sent us trial subscribers during the past week. Thus the work goes bravely on, disseminating the glorious seeds of Spiritualism.

—Do you want to buy a buggy or wagon? Then read the advertisement in another column, of our old friend, Kinney. We believe him to be a reliable business man, and that you will always get from him just what you buy.

—Brother Swan Petterson, of Knoxville, Ill. speaks flatteringly of Dr. Ellis B. George, as a healer.

—It was Mr. David Vankirk, instead of Fankirk, who passed to spirit life, as published in the JOURNAL of the 22nd ult.

—Brother H. B. Dow informs us that Dr. Thomas is lecturing at Minneapolis every Sunday at two o'clock, P. M. He is an excellent trance speaker.

—Addie L. Sallou, who has been meeting with great success in the lecture field in various parts of the South, and in this state, is now engaged for the month of May, at Terre Haute, Ind.

—Brother Swan Patterson speaks in high terms of Dr. Ellis B. George, of Knoxville, Ill. He regards him as an excellent healer.

—We understand that Dr. A. Stone, of Troy, N. Y., is getting up a work on magnetism and self-cure.

—See notice of general meeting at Halsey's Station, Oregon.

—Mrs. M. H. Parry, formerly Mattie Huelit, has been lecturing successfully at Beloit, Wis.

—The Springfield, Ill., Atlas, for May 4th, contains a spirited wood cut, representing the new State Capital building placed on wheels, and being drawn away by two large dogs, labelled respectively Chicago Tribune and Chicago Times. The Tribune mastiff holds up by the neck a poor little cur labeled "Register." The Times is treating another poor pup marked "Journal," in the same manner. This terrible canine team is driven by a beautiful young lady whose head is encircled by a band bearing the strange device, "Peoria." To those who are familiar with our Capital controversy, this illustration is full of meaning.

—Henry Hammon, of White Oak Point, sends us one dollar and fifty cents, but does not give the name of his state.

—The signature, S. Gasly, appended to a communication in reference to Charles H. Read, should have been R. Garter.

—Dr. D. P. Rayner, who has been engaged in practice as a surgeon and clairvoyant physician for the past nine years in Erie and vicinity, is about removing to St. Charles, Ill., where he has purchased a residence. The doctor has many warm friends in this section who will regret his departure, and whose best wishes for his future prosperity in his new home will attend him.—Erie, (Pa) Dispatch.

Thomas Garrett.

Another great and good man has passed to the higher life. As this record reached the community, how many hearts sent forth a blessing to the dear noble spirit gone upward! There is always something sublimely grand in the aspect of death, whether it comes to the great or the lowly,—to the little buds of beauty that so often sanctify our lives and homes for a brief season, and then pass from our sight in all their loveliness and bloom, or, when in maturer life, the parent stem is broken or extended to the life of the angel—or, as in the present case, when the "shock of corn is fully ripe," when the "golden grain is rich unto the harvest," waiting only for the angel messenger to garner the sainted treasure in a home "eternal in the heavens."

The record of this good man is so well and widely known, that it only becomes us to express our high appreciation of his noble character—his generous sympathy and help toward suffering humanity. Through a long and useful life he labored for the elevation of all mankind, but especially in the anti-slavery cause was he an active worker; through evil and through good report,—through persecution and trial, and large pecuniary sacrifices, he stood firm and unflinching in the cause of right.

Twenty-five hundred slaves were lifted through his help, from the pit of slavery into the heaven of freedom,—not by force or carnal weapons, but by giving "a cup of cold water" to every thirsting spirit that knocked at his door, which was always open for the oppressed and hunted fugitive—supplying the "loaves and fishes" for their physical need, and a blessing of hope and cheer for the spiritual—guiding them toward the "North star" of liberty.

Realizing the inherent right of all men to life and liberty, he hesitated not in aiding God's poorest children to this inalienable inheritance, while the dark stain of chattle slavery clouds our nation's life.

Not only in this reform did our elder brother labor, but for the elevation and redemption of man and woman from every form of sin and suffering. He was interested in Spiritualism, the greatest and best blessing to mankind, though, perhaps, he did not comprehend its vast depth and importance. His mind was always open to receive truth and light. He often referred to communications he had received with much pleasure. Such a spirit will not be long in the higher life without realizing the beauty and holiness of this glorious religion. By such lives and such deaths are we incited to a closer walk with God, our Father. And while this new-born spirit was partaking of the divine realities of his new home, thousands of earthly friends were left to bless the great Father, saying, "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord." "Thou hast fought the good fight; thou hast kept the faith; thy reward will surely be great." And the loving angels catching this sad refrain from the meek and lowly sufferers whom he had aided, and the great and gifted, who have co-labored with him, echo back to earth, that "all is well" with him, and re-echoing along the banks of the "beautiful river," and up the "evergreen mountains of celestial life," they form a golden archway for the angel born spirit, and crowning him with a wreath of fadeless flowers, bidding him enter in and partake of the joy in store for all who love and do the right. He lovingly will his active noble spirit resume the good work ever waiting for willing hands to do, and may his mission be to return here teaching us to do the will of our Father "on earth as it is in heaven."

Spiritualism.

The twenty-third anniversary of Modern Spiritualism was held yesterday at Harmonial Hall, Seventh and Wood streets. The exercises began in the afternoon at three o'clock. A fair audience was in attendance, and the business of the afternoon was commenced by calling Joseph John, Esq., to the chair. The entertainment which followed consisted of a series of recitations and singing by the Williams Children and others, interspersed with music on the piano. During the course of the afternoon an address was delivered by Mrs. Yeaw under inspiration.

In the evening the chair was occupied by Dr. H. T. Child. A musical entertainment was given by the Amphion Glee Club, after which an address was delivered by Mrs. Nellie J. T. Brigham, her subject being, "The Temple of Truth." She referred to the origin of spiritualistic manifestations, and gave a historical sketch of its rise and progress; stating that the first authentic communication from the spiritual world was received twenty-three years ago, and since that time, although all manner of obstacles had been thrown in the way, it had increased in strength and numbers, the opposition melting away like ice beneath the sun.

Scaffolds were erected for the purpose of getting materials up to the proper height for its construction of a building, and yet the scaffold was no ornament to the structure, so the prejudices against Spiritualism were only the scaffold which would carry materials for the erection of the temple of truth, and which would be removed, leaving a beautiful monument to the advancement of the times.

At the conclusion of her lecture, Mrs. Brigham delivered what was styled an improvised poem, entitled "Presence of the beloved dead."

At the conclusion of the exercises a collation was partaken of in the basement of the hall, which had been prepared by the ladies, and at which addresses were made, and glees sung by the club above mentioned.

An Incident on Keeling Island.

In the second volume of Darwin's voyage of a Naturalist, page 250, we find the following statement:

After dinner, (on Keeling Island in the Indian Ocean) we stayed to see a curious, half-superstitious scene acted by the Malay women.

A large wooden spoon dressed in garments, and which had been carried to the grave of a dead man, they pretend becomes inspired at the full of the moon, and will dance and jump about. After the proper preparations, the spoon held by two women became convulsed, and danced in good time to the song of the surrounding children and women. This narrative is well enough, but the philosopher becomes the participant, when he adds, "It was a most foolish spectacle;" but Mr. Lisak maintained that many of the Malays believed in its spiritual movements. The dance did not commence till the moon had risen, and it was worth remaining to behold here bright orbs so quietly shining through the long arms of the cocoanut trees, as they waved in the evening breeze.

Darwin is a progressive man. He could spend weeks in digging out a fossil bone, but not an hour in seeking for the cause of an important phenomena which he chooses to call "half superstitious."

When will scientific men open their eyes to all the facts around them? The fact in this case was in accordance with natural law, and the Malay women were the philosophers, while the "half superstition" was in the mind of Dr. Darwin, and he will yet acknowledge this.

Invocation.

Oh, Thou spirit that speaks to us at all times and seasons. Thou whose inspiration cometh to all those who earnestly seek after it.

We would at this time express our gratitude for that care which gives life its many blessings; for all that wisdom and love that is given to us; for whatever life may be on earth, however circumstanced and surrounded, it is always a blessing and never a curse. Man may oftimes consider it a doubtful blessing; may oftimes slight that precious gift of life, because from its many temptations, its many failures in the path of duty—it seems to them that it can not be such a blessing. We thank thee for the earth-life as it is, not as the mere surface of existence, but as a mirror in which the life and beauty, the joy and truth of the spirit world is reflected. We thank thee that we are learning to-day that this earth-life is not all there is of life; that in it we are only learning through eyes that are dimmed with tears, and shaded by earth's experience, but as the angels teach us beyond and above this earthly existence, there is a world to full of truth and promise and realization; that from the saddest and most mournful of all earthly experiences, we shall find enough to make us joyful hereafter. So, oh, Father, we thank thee that from the present, as it expands out into the future, we learn only of thy love and thy wisdom. Help us through the teachings of the angels; through all pure and holy inspirations to bear the burdens of life as best we may—knowing that afterwards crowns the cross. Help us to work out our own salvation, not in fear and trembling, but in cheerfulness and hopefulness, knowing that whatever is to-day shall be for the best,—so blessing us and bringing out our own purity, whatever others may do, our own charity; our own faith and love. So, oh, Father, shall we bless ourselves, and be most truly blessed.—N. J. T. Brigham.

Stars receive and give light; if they did not give out or reflect the light which they have, they would not be seen.—Ibid.

Humanity may be compared to a wheel. Shall that part which is up in the sunshine, condemn that which is down in the dust, while all belong to the one circle?—Ibid.

Learn to be positive to all that is below you, and negative to all that is above you in purity. —S Parst.

Compensation.

The greatest sorrows of our lives,
Are richest blessings in disguise.
The darkest storms which may assail,
Are brightest joys time will unveil.
The hardest trials to endure,
Are those which make the soul most pure.
As wintry winds and spangling showers
Bring forth the sweetest, fairest flowers.
So hope for the future, and do not repine,
For every dark cloud has a silver line.

—M. M. J.

What is it can be green as grass; as white as snow; as blue as the heavens, and as black as woe? The human soul. It can be green with living faith; white with purity; blue with heavenly truth, and black with human sin.—Ibid.

I hear a spirit say, the essence of spiritual thoughts are like the perfume from flowers. The interior essence that rises from pure feelings, is borne up to heaven's bright bower, and from thence the angels waft it back to earth in a more spiritualized form. There is more perfume sometimes in one little tiny flower of the field, than twenty human souls can yield, because they do not spiritualize their thoughts before they send them forth.—Ibid.

Obituary.

Died, April 30th, Ann Amelia Wood, aged 41 years, only daughter of John M. Wood of Webster, Rice Co., Minn.

Over the river, out of the gloom,
The angels took her in life's full bloom:
Warm hands grasp hers on the other side.
All tears are wiped from her lovely eyes.

With joy she sees, and glad surprise,
The woodrose boauths before her rise,
Of the glorious life in "Summer Land,"
And the happy angels hand in hand.

NOTICE OF MEETINGS.

SPEAKERS' AND MASS CONVENTION.

As Chairman of the Committee appointed by the Northwestern Speakers' Association, I am requested to call a Speakers' and Mass Convention, to be held at Smith's Opera House, Decatur, Illinois, on the 2d, 3d, and 4th days of June, 1871; to commence its first session on Friday, June 2d, at 10 o'clock A. M.; and to continue them for the three days as directed by the Convention.

This Association has commenced a series of meetings to gradually change the good social conventions that have found many good homes for worr, wearied, and sick mediums and speakers, to good social science conventions, to establish the rules by which all faithful workers in the cause of truth will receive a just support. Such progress is necessary, in this transition period of religious associations, from the theological to the scientific, and from the rule of the Christian priests of earth, licensed by man, to that of the angels of heaven, through mediums licensed by the laws of God.

This Convention is called to continue the progressive work of the Association, to establish the order and love of the angels in heaven, among the people of the earth.

Invitation is extended to all to be present. Those who attend will receive a cordial reception by the Spiritualists and their friends in Decatur.

Persons wishing special information about this entertainment of speakers and others, will address the Secretary of the Committee of Reception. H. Righter, Box 290 Decatur, Ill.

By request of Mrs. M. J. Wilcoxson, Moses Hull, D. W. Hull, Harvey A. Jones, Dr. Samuel Underhill, and Addie L. Ballou.

H. S. BROWN, M. D., Chairman.

NOTICE.

The Semi-Annual Convention of the State Association of Spiritualists of Minnesota, will meet at Farmington, Dacota County, Minnesota, June 2d, 3d, and 4th, 1871.

All delegates attending will please notice the following rules of railroad companies. On St. Paul and Sioux City R. R. excursion tickets will be sold by agents at the various stations (return tickets included), for full fare one way. On Milwaukee and St. Paul R. R., including Hastings and Dacota R. R., parties will purchase excursion tickets at various offices, for 60 per cent. of full round trip fare. On Lake Superior and Mississippi R. R., including Baldwin R. R., delegates will be returned free, on certificate of Secretary of Convention that they paid full fare over that road in going to Convention. On St. Paul and Pacific R. R., delegates will find Convention tickets in the hands of the conductors on the trains only. Delegates can get board at the hotels in Farmington, for $1.00 per day.

It is expected that Peter West will be present.

HARRIET H. POPE, Secretary.

Morristown, Rice Co., Minn.

Mediums' and Speakers' Convention.

A Quarterly Convention of Mediums, Speakers, and others, of Western New York, will be held at Ridgeway, Orleans Co., Saturday and Sunday, May 20th and 21th, commencing at 10 o'clock each day.

The place of meeting is on the flower-embowered Ridge road, three miles north of the railroad station of Medina, from whence friends engage to convey attendants to and from the Convention. Also to entertain all who may come.

Thus, with temporal needs supplied, amid an atmosphere attuned to harmony and perfumed by flowers, and overshadowed by the bending heavens, aglow with angel ministrations, may we not anticipate a glorious re-union? A cordial invitation to attend is extended to all truth-seekers.

J. W. SEAVER,
GEO. W. TAYLOR,
A. E. TRACY,
Committee

MICHIGAN ASSOCIATION.

The semi-annual meeting of the Michigan Association of Spiritualists will be held at East Saginaw, commencing on the second Friday of June, and continuing over Saturday and Sunday. Each Society is entitled to three representatives, and each County Circle to as many as the county has members in the legislature.

Friends, give this notice your attention, and let us go to the feast with gladness and zeal, with full determination to take a long step upward in the journey of life.

J. M. Peebles and other good speakers will be present to instruct, and with the objects of interest to be seen in that fine and growing section, we may by communing with nature, and kindred souls, be strengthened for coming conflicts. The place is easy of access by railroads, and the good friends promise good cheer and hospitality.

E. L. MANCHESTER, Pres.

J. P. ARGALL, Sec.

THREE DAYS MEETING.

The friends of progress, free thought and free religion, will hold their anniversary meeting on the 16th, 17th, and 18th days of June, at the Free Church, in the village of Sturgis, commencing on Friday, at 10 o'clock A. M., and continuing until Sunday evening.

Able speakers from abroad will be in attendance to address the people. Ample provision will be made to accommodate strangers who attend the meeting. A general invitation is extended to all to meet with us on this occasion, to discuss questions that concern humanity at large.

By order of the Executive Committee.

OREGON GROVE MEETING.

The Spiritualists of Oregon will hold a four days meeting at Halsey's Station, on the O. & C. R. R., seventeen miles north of Salem, Marion Co., commencing on Thursday, June 29th, 1871.

A general invitation is extended to all, and mediums and speakers especially.

By order of Committee. JOHN S. HAWKINS.
R. V. SWOAR.

April 23d, 1871.

NUNICA.

The Spiritualists of Nunica, Ottawa Co., Mich., will hold their quarterly meeting in the Bartholomew School-house, on the second Saturday and Sunday in June, commencing Saturday, at two o'clock P. M.

Mrs. S. A. Farrell is engaged as speaker. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD,

Healing Medium,

Has been before the public as a successful Healer the past fifteen years. We rely entirely on the controlling influences. We diagnose and give prescriptions by letter. Distance no objection. Will visit in person a reasonable distance when that desire, and can afford the expense. Delineation and advice in a variety of ways. Emblems we give gratuitously to all our patients, when prescribed by our guides. Our former custom has been to come en rapport with the applicant by the hand-writing or look of hair; but to save time, and the unpleasant sensation of talking on the symptoms of the disease, we require the applicant to give age and sex, with one or two leading symptoms of the disease, written by the patient, if able to write—if not, send lock of hair. As the giving of tests is not the object which we seek, but to restore the patient to health by Nature's own hand, in the shortest time possible, we do not deem it necessary here to lumber up an advertisement with what we have done or what we can do, but prefer to be known by our fruits.

Terms, for diagnosis and prescription, $3; Diagnosis without prescription, $1; all subsequent prescriptions, $2 each. All letters should be accompanied with the fee, and addressed to MRS. LODEMA ATWOOD, Box 45, Lake Mills, Jefferson Co., Wis.

MRS. A. H. ROBINSON,

Healing, Psychometric and Business Medium

148 Fourth Avenue, Chicago.

MRS. ROBINSON, while under spirit control, on receiving a lock of hair of a sick patient, will diagnose the nature of the disease most perfectly, and prescribe the proper remedy. Yet, as the most speedy cure is the essential object in view, rather than to gratify idle curiosity, the better practice is to send along with a lock of hair, a brief statement of the sex, age, leading symptoms and duration of the disease of the sick person, when she will without delay return a most potent prescription and remedy for eradicating the disease and permanently curing the patient in all curable cases.

Of herself she claims no knowledge of the healing art, but when her spirit guides are brought "en rapport" with a sick person through her mediumship, they never fail to give immediate and permanent relief in curable cases, through the POSITIVE AND NEGATIVE POWERS existent in the system and in nature. This prescription is sent by mail, and be it an internal remedy, or an external application, it should be given or applied precisely as directed in the accompanying letter of instructions, however simple it may seem to be; remember it is not the quantity of the compound, but the chemical effect that is produced, that science takes cognizance of.

One prescription is usually sufficient, but in case the patient is not permanently cured by one prescription, the application for a second, or more if required, should be made in about ten days after the last, each time stating any changes that may be apparent in the symptoms of the disease.

MRS. ROBINSON also, through her mediumship, diagnoses the diseases of any one who calls upon her at her residence. The facility with which the spirits controling her accomplish the same, is done as well when the application is by letter as when the the patient is present. Her gifts are very remarkable, not only in the healing art, but as a psychometric, test, business and trance medium.

Terms:—Diagnosis and first prescription, $2.00; each subsequent one, $1.00; Psychometric Delineation of Character, $3; answering Business Letters, $3. The money should accompany the application, to insure a reply.

FUNERAL ORATION.

Oration on the Victims of the France-Prussian War, Delivered by Mrs. Emma Hardinge, at Cleveland Hall, London, on Sunday evening, April 2nd, 1871.

INVOCATION.

Lord of life and King of death! Spirit from whom we come, to whom we return! Thou who hast entrusted us in charge with the missions of life and death, of which thou holdest the key,—look upon us in this hour of counsel, when we stand in the presence of the mighty dead—the dead who in all ages of the past thou hast commissioned as ministering angels to instruct us in thy power,—the dead whom in our ignorance, our blindness, and our blood-guiltiness, we have destroyed—the dead whom man's ambition, and the lust of power and kingly rule have violently thrust into another world—the dead for whom we mourn, but far more mourning for ourselves that we have made them so, cut them off ere the work that thou hast given them be finished. In this holy presence of thine we stand this night, and ask thy blessing on our counsels; ask that thou wilt give us wisdom and inspiration to sanctify even our trespass and disgrace to the evolvement of higher laws, higher wisdom, higher life than that from which we strayed. O Infinite Spirit, High Priest of every place where two or three are gathered together in the sacred name of God and the right, we dictate this hour of counsel to thy service; we ask that thou wilt sanctify it with thy blessings, and lift us up by these counsels nearer, nearer, our God to thee!

[The oration was preceded by a poetical reading purporting to be from William Howitt's new work, "The Mad War Planet." Mrs. Hardinge held in her hand some sheets of paper, upon which appeared to be writing. From this the gifted lady seemed to read in the most eloquent manner for about forty minutes. We were astonished to observe how little attention she gave to the paper in her hand, and with what wonderful and original emphasis she rendered the meaning of the matter recited. Our readers will be disappointed if they expect to find these burning pictures of war and its consequences in Mr. Howitt's book. We understand that the poetry was nearly all improvised on the spot, the chief exception being the opening verses. Though it was a Sunday service, at which the hearers are expected to maintain a reverent stillness, yet the crowded hall was repeatedly the scene of general and hearty applause. The effect produced was the very opposite of the haughty war feeling. If the audience had at the moment known the true source of the poetry, the enthusiasm would no doubt have been much greater. We think it due both to Mr. Howitt and Mrs. Hardinge to state these facts; and the treatment of the subject will well bear a retrospect, from which those who were fortunate enough to be present, may enjoy the occasion over again. All who heard the poetical oration of last Sunday evening, will agree with us that a similar service from Mrs. Hardinge and her inspiring guides in the spiritual realms would be peculiarly desirable at some future time.]

It is seldom, very seldom, friends, that civilians hear the truth, the real truth, concerning the scenes and events which they honor and respect, and reverence, and chant in song, and blare in art, and celebrate with pomp, and praise God for in religion—that form of war which is here described in its simple reality. You do not like to hear it, but perhaps you would like far less to take part in it; and yet such scenes as these have fallen upon peaceful cities like your own, innocent, blameless creatures, like those that now surround you. It is but a few short months since the gayest, fairest, most unthinking people that the world supplies, people in the world were, as you now are, listening to the tales of war as to idle romance and fiction; and it is but a few short months since the sun of that brightness has gone out in blood, and this gay, happy, unthinking people are the miserable victims that are here depicted. Do not say such scenes will belong to you—that you have no lot or part in them—that your cares should never be assailed by these tales of horror. There are none that can say, when the war demon is abroad, and the war fury is sweeping the earth with its desolating breath, what nation, land, or people shall not be the next selected by the scourge. If not, however, for your own interests, for the love of God, for the sake of the holy but fearful truths here related—in pity for your brotherman—in pity for the breaking hearts, the ruined homes, the blackened hearths, and the silent dead that can never plead with you, in pity for all these, take a lesson home to your own hearts from the dreadful scourge which while I utter these notes is now humbled into dust, and sits like Rachel weeping for her slain, and still more hopelessly gazes over the fair land where they lie, no longer able to defend or rescue her, still trodden by the foot of the insatiate demon, and still writhing beneath the curse of what William Howitt so justly calls "The Mad War Planet!" I tell you it belongs to every man, woman, and child in our midst, to acquaint themselves with the actual facts of this tremendous scourge; and when we realize that it is not brought, as we call it, by the visitation of God, that it is no affliction incurred in those mysterious providences over which we have no control, but that it is the work of us of our own race—that it is the foul, fell, hideous work of those who, like you and me, worship the same God, profess to believe in the divine humanity and brotherhood of man, and pray to Him for a blessing on the very deeds of hideous slaughter which they consecrate by the name of glory.

But little remains for me to say after the eloquent and burning words of the aged prophet, who is passing into the summer land, whilst the golden curtains are being drawn for his victorious entrance—but little remains for me to add to his glorious protest against the last worst crime of the age, only to offer a few words of sympathy, respect, pity and perhaps of mournful affection for those who have fallen beneath the curse which society has perpetrated in the name of authority. After the great holocaust that has been offered up on the altars of human rage, no good is done, nothing is effected, no laws have been enacted, no benefit has been derived to one living creature, nothing but wreck and ruin, nothing but the installment of the war fever into thousands of minds, that before were peaceful and well ordered,—nothing but to let slip the dogs of war to ravage the miserable land that has never gained one single jot of benefit or blessing by all the mighty sacrifices that have been poured out. Oh, if, in the face of this senseless folly, this useless rage, this most miserable and vain sacrifice, there are no voices but that of one weak woman raised to protest against such hideous and unchristian acts, shame be to the age! Reason is dead, and King Murder rules Europe. The silent battle-field—the battle-field where, but a few brief weeks ago, thousands of pale, cold, dead faces lay with their dull eyes upturned to the quiet stars—a spectacle too horrible for human sight to look upon—a spectacle which even the demons that wrought it were glad to put out of their blanched and withered sight—the battle-field, with the blackened homes, the ruined villages, and some few gaunt, famine-stricken, ruined creatures creeping over them, is all that now remains for me to philosophize upon.

A few brief lessons alone, then, may be deduced from this scene, and these I offer as the conclusion I draw from my text.

First, I believe that this blood can not have been shed in vain—utterly in vain; that since the fury of man has so perverted the providences of the great good God that built up the thousands of noble forms that man has destroyed, it is a part of His providence to work evil into good, and to convert even the darkest and most fatal acts of man into lessons of instruction and wisdom. Such a lesson is now before our eyes, and it is all summed up in the two words, the inutility of war—the senseless, hopeless, utterly ruinous inutility of war. I can not but believe, that when the time comes that the nations shall awake from this mighty fever that is on them, and the dreadful incubus of actual slaughter shall have passed from the land that has put away the dripping sword, we shall feel in the Old World, as I believe every inhabitant of the New World feels, that the last war has been fought, that the last slaughter-battle has been enacted, and that the day has come when a mightier warfare must be entered upon—the warfare of human reason—the warfare of the mighty spirit of public opinion, which, as William Howitt suggests, shall compel those that propose to go to war to vacate the seats of government; that the very proposition for legalized murder shall be their own fixed act of dethronement; and that peoples will no more be led, like beasts of the field or cattle, to human shambles to gratify the ambition, the insensate pride and lust of power of human rulers. If this lesson be indeed read aright, as I think the signs of the times are beginning to predicate that it will be, then indeed the blood that has been shed has not been poured out utterly in vain, then indeed some stars of promise arise in the black horizon, and urge me to turn from the fatal spectacle of the slain to the possible destiny of the souls that have been thus violently thrust from their human tabernacles, and to conclude by inquiring, what has death done to them? Where are they now? Under what conditions are they existing? What for the martyrs of this foul and fell crime of ambition—what for them, if not for their destroyers? To this there are many of us that are qualified to give an answer.

There are many of us who have beheld the shadowy curtains of eternity drawn from before its awful portals, and the realities of continued life displayed before our eyes. There are many of us, especially during the last dreadful struggle in the land of the West, who have beheld hosts of freed souls that have been violently thrust from their bodies, hovering in mighty armies over the scene of their former habitation, and gladly revealing to their fellowmen the conditions under which life was continued for them. These souls return to tell us that the act that deprived them of mortal life has never severed their connection with earth,—that it is one of the great and terrible evils of murder, that it recalls in every direction,—that there is no compensation for it,—that it is one of those fearful infractions of God's law for which man cannot atone except by the deepest and most remorseful agonies through, perhaps, ages to come. Those slain soldiers of ours inform us that, though in the better and more just conditions of life eternal their motives are considered, and the helplessness with which peoples are driven by their rulers to the act of slaughter attaches to them neither blame nor responsibility,—that though struck down by the fearful and shameful necessity that has imposed murder upon them, they cease to be responsible, nevertheless that a great wrong has been done them,—that they enter upon a sphere of existence neither prepared to receive them, nor a life for which they are prepared,—that God has endowed man with life as the most sacred of all obligations; that he has planted him here on earth for the high and the noble purpose of unfolding all the powers of his soul; that this is the schoolhouse for the spirit, and that no other condition can serve the spirit but this earth; and that those who by any act, legally, as it is termed, or illegally, break into the house of life, commit a far greater wrong than they know of,—they not only usurp the privilege and office of the Lord of life and death, and violently wrest the power from the hands of God, but they impress upon the freed soul the necessity of returning to earth and performing as a spirit, hovering round the scenes of its former existence, the unfulfilled and broken missions of earth. Here, then, the slain of the battle-field still perform, sometimes to great disadvantage, the unfinished purposes of their Creator in their earthly lives. Here, then, those whom we think we have rid ourselves of, calling them our enemies and rejoicing when our eyes behold them no more, still throng around us, some with the same restless purposes of hate and vengeance, some with the earthly feelings that they carried with them unchanged, but happily more freed by the act of death and the scales of blindness falling from their eyes, grieving, grieving that the thread of their usefulness has been severed, and humbly and hopefully toiling in the spheres of the better life to perform the purposes that God assigned them upon this earth. Thus such a spirit as this possesses the soldier, his life is indeed cut off from earthly usefulness, for he returns with the inspiration of his whole soul and mind bent to impress upon his fellowmen the horror of the crime of taking life, and the necessity of substituting reason for the fatal and insensate action and arbitration of the sword. Thousands and millions of those that have been deprived of material life are pleading with the media in every part of this world to plead with men for themselves. This is one of the conditions of those that have passed from the horrors of the battle-field to the hereafter. Oh, how different to the fictions that they chant in the churches, when they laud you of the palms of victory that crown the brows of the martyrs that have died in the service of their country—of the laurels of eternity that are waving to greet the patriots that have been sacrificed and nobly laid down their lives for the honor and glory of their country! Fiction! inventions of those that have too long kept you in ignorance! Such is not the case—such is not the condition of the freed spirits of those that have been sacrificed by the act of murder. They mourn over that act; they mourn for their fellowmen; they mourn for themselves. And this said, there is yet another page to reveal.

It was given to your speaker to be present at a scene where, through the lips of an entranced medium (one who gave the most abundant evidence of being fully possessed by the souls of the departed), one of the victims from the battle-fields of blood-stained America presented himself, and asked leave to describe another phase of spiritual existence good for us to know. His representation was that of a great battle-field in the poem so piteously and graphically pictured to you as lying, perishing, but not yet dead, upon the dreadful battle-field. For eighteen hours he lay exposed to horrors and sufferings from which the ears of humanity would shrink; your hearts would wither up were you but to hear the piteous tale. It is a representative one, for thousands and thousands have perished in just such miseries. The approach of the heavy artillery wagon, ploughing into the gory earth and into the panting, throbbing hearts and brains of the dying, at last put an end to his tortures, and he knew no more; but in the few moments that ensued between the approach of the heavy instrument of horrible, mutilating death and the act itself, in those few moments he described a panorama of existence passing before his mind's eye such as no tongue of a mortal can depict,—not only the events of his own life, but the events of the whole nation, the entire history of humanity in the past, floated before him; the mighty battle of human life was fought in all its horrors; age upon age stepped up with all its phantom people in the mighty struggle of the soul of man, rising in one common march of humanity from savagism to civilization. With it all the laws of God, so good, so wise, so bountiful, were mapped out on the one side, and all the trespass, the blindness, and wickedness of man on the other. His spirit, struggling to escape from its mashed, bruised, and broken tenement, beheld the judgment on every act and deed, with all its consequences, all its penalties, and all the triumphs and victories that ensue in the deep silence of our own souls when we crush back one single bad thought or overcome one bad propensity. All this he beheld in a space of time less than we could count—in one minute, and then all was done; and when he awoke to the strains of the mightiest requiem that ever broke on the ear of an enfranchised spirit, he was in the midst of hosts of just men made perfect; he found that the martyrdoms of a thousand years had been crowded into that little minute of time,—that all the experiences that he could have gained in a thousand successive generations of births and deaths upon earth had been fulfilled,—that in the great and unspeakable agony of that one moment as he beheld the monstrous engine of the hideous death advancing till it crushed him,—that mighty judgment on earth and all her peoples had ensued,—he knew that the spirit time is no more, space is no more, and that the martyrdoms which we suffer, no matter how brief be the moment in which they occur, are the means of discipline, the means of purification—are the steps by which the soul ascends from its rudimental state to the mighty and triumphant round of angelic perfection.

Thank God, then, for the crowns of martyrdom which are sparkling on many a brow of the humble and nameless victims of the battle-field. Whilst we can not forgive their destroyers—whilst we know that there is no law of extenuation for the foul acts that have destroyed them—whilst we know that just penalties must visit those who, for their own foul purposes, have driven these helpless ones to death, it is the consolation of the Spiritualist to be assured that these victims have not suffered in vain,—that the kind and merciful all-Father has ordained for them that blessing of compensation which crowns them with a glory in proportion to the misery and suffering they have endured. Do not let us talk of time for them; do not let us count up human experiences for them. God help the poor soldier from the hour when, with broken heart and streaming eyes, he leaves wife and children, and home and friends—from the moment when, step by step, he endures all the miseries of the camp, the hunger, the cold, the starvation, the famine, the pain, and at last the dreadful death; the steps of his martyrdom are being trod. We know not his name, we take no heed of who the bruised and battered form might have been—we put them out of sight, but God numbers them all. Angel friends are waiting with open arms to receive them—hovering above that ghastly charnel house, the pitying spirits of the pure and loving are there awaiting these new-born souls, and compensating as best they may for the broken and unfulfilled purposes of earth—gently, mercifully, tenderly disentangling the bruised and broken-hearted spirit from the wreck and ruin it has left behind, and haling them through the red and fiery gates of martyrdom into the glorious triumphs that await the suffering souls of humanity. Thus much on our victims.

But little remains to be said. For those who have been the cause of this dreadful calamity. It is enough that they can not escape from its consequences; whilst our poor soldiers' enfranchised spirits, with glory on the one side, and the necessity for outworking earthly discipline on the other, are still compelled to toil and labor at the gates of earth to perform the work that was given them to do, but to perform it with that light of eternity on their souls which affords full compensation for their share of the wreck and ruin. Whilst, therefore, we can safely trust them in the hands of the all-Father, we learn from the same sources that the images of their death—the images of the wrong and ruin in the widow, the orphan, the ruined and broken-hearted they have left behind, never cease to dog the steps of their destroyers, until in the mysterious processes of purification they too shall have fully atoned for the wrong deeds done. But how long they must suffer—how long the dark and dreadful penalties may require time for payment, it is not for us to count up. I only affirm, were every monarch, legislator, ruler, and teacher, but aware of the stupendous and awful truths of Spiritualism—were but its justice proclaimed from end to end of the earth, and, instead of the foolish, aimless amusement that are derived from its exhibitions, the awful tale of its eternal truths, its [illegible] angels that they are themselves creating to dog their footsteps for ages, and bless God that they had been warned in time to flee from the wrath to come.

This is my memento and my testimony of the glorious and stupendous truths of Spirit-revelation.

NEW YORK.

Missionary Work in the Empire State.

TO THE SPIRITUALISTS OF NEW YORK:

Believing the plan of Mass Conventions, conducted as they have been by missionaries in Michigan and Wisconsin, cause a means whereby more minds can can be reached, and a greater good wrought out by the same force employed than by the more ordinary methods, we hope in resuming missionary labors with the return of more genial weather, to devote a good proportion of the summer to this object. Bro. George W. Taylor, of Collins, has consented to accompany us wherever arrangements are made and a call given for a two day's meeting, and the ability and spiritual culture which he will bring to the task, will render such gatherings memorable and of wide-spread influence for good, and ought to prove an incentive to more than ordinary effort toward the achievement of this purpose. As is well understood in this part of the State, where Bro. Taylor has addressed so many thousands, no speaker is capable of doing a better work, or leaves a more happy and lasting influence over an audience.

We have had many calls from the central and eastern portions of the State, which we have been unable to heed, but we shall expect to do so in the near future, and we should like to hear from other localities at once, and particularly where a meeting of the kind is desired and proper facilities exist, that the time and order may be arranged and ample notice given. Where halls are not to be had, groves may be, and in the days of sunshine, we may hope for [illegible] ter success under the leafy bough,—"in the air where the spirit may find room."

Friends, lend a helping hand. Let us work while we may. Let us unite in an earnest effort to put the cause of religious freedom in the Empire State, in the coming half year, further on. We have the means and the numbers to render ourselves of immense usefulness, if we but make it our purpose to shed the light we have into the darkened places in the land—and shall we not do it?

Idolatry and superstition still exist. It is an hour of need, if not of peril, and never was the call more urgent that every man should do his duty.

SPIRITUAL DEVELOPMENT.

Letter From Jason Steele.

BROTHER JONES:—Is the law of spiritual development understood? For one I confess ignorance. Amid all the light thrown on this subject by the learned and talented contributors to your excellent JOURNAL; with the knowledge which Doctors Underhill, Fahnestock, and others have imparted, and the multiplicity of mediums,—embracing almost every imaginable phase,—is it unreasonable to suppose that long ere this, the law would be so perfectly understood, that any one possessing ordinary intelligence and mediumistic powers, could, with spirit aid develop themselves, so as to obtain satisfactory evidence of spirit life beyond the grave, and thereby be prepared to demonstrate the truths of the Spiritual Philosophy to all honest, inquiring minds? But the fact that there are hundreds in the land, who have sincerely desired, and faithfully sought these spiritual gifts,—some of whom have sought them for months and years,—yet have failed in whole or part, is evidence to my mind that the law is not understood. They have read Underhill, tried Fahnestock's theory, sat in circles, and alone, and earnestly followed all the knowledge in their power, while only now and then have they obtained a glimmering ray of light, which has shot meteor-like across their darkened minds, then expiring, leaving the darkness more impenetrable, and the mystery more inscrutable—nothing satisfactory is obtained, at least not sufficient to satisfy a rational man with himself.

Sometimes I think there is no law for spiritual development applicable to all, from the fact that organizations and temperaments differ so widely—some possessed of fine organization, a fine brain, a nervous, sensitive nature, while others are coarser in physiological structure, coarser in brain material, in temperament, and nature directly the opposite of the other. How, then, can there be a law of universal adaptation?

And are not those who advertise themselves as developing mediums, imposing upon the public by promising more than they can perform? There are hundreds of partially developed mediums, some of whom are poor, and the knowledge of the law of spiritual development, enabling them to advance and become a blessing to the world, should not be withheld by those professing to have it, because they have not the dollar to pay,—while there are others who would gladly pay five or fifty dollars for that knowledge which would bring them en rapport with the angel world. Should there be any such general law (which I doubt), the one who discovers and announces it to the world, will be greater than a Newton, and remembered with more gratitude than a Howard.

But, Brother Jones, I commenced this article for the purpose of writing, at your request, a little of my experience, and here I have been wandering all this time.

I make no claims to mediumship of any kind, yet, I have earnestly desired, and sincerely sought to become one.

1.—To satisfy my own mind of the truth (if truth it be) of spirit existence.

2.—To be able from personal knowledge, to demonstrate that truth to others.

My own experience is connected with my daughter's. She commenced before I did, and without my knowledge, sitting for spiritual development. Soon obtained written communications, passed through that most trying ordeal of crucifixion,—nervous prostration,—hopes and fears alternately excited,—with which every medium is familiar, and now by impression, obtains communications from spirits purporting to come from Poe, Byron, and Burns.

Near the close of the year 1869, I had been then sitting every day for two months, without getting anything reliable or satisfactory. True my hand would shake, and write names and sentences, but I obtained nothing on which I could depend as evidence, and often thought it to be emanations from my own mind. I held disputes with some of her influences—denied spirit existence—doubted their identity, and said to them:

"If you can give your names, you can also give unquestionable proof of your existence."

They failed then but promised to do so soon. At this time my mind was uncommonly excitable. I could see phosphorescent lights in the dark, sometimes strange faces would momentarily appear before me, which I called phantasms, and attributed to my nervous condition.

On the evening of Dec. 30, my daughter inquired if I had tried to write with a small horseshoe magnet we had? I replied, "No." Immediately took it, turned to the table, when it wrote, "Henry Greeley." At that moment I was taken with a violent pain in the side of my head and jaw. The pain was most intense. My daughter placed her hands on my head, and made a few passes which relieved me. She took a seat a few feet from me, when I saw a fire-red light, nearly in the shape of a heart, directly over her left shoulder. At the same time, an influence, strange to her, began to exclaim in most profane language:

"Where am I? How in h—l came I here? I must get out of this. Who says I shan't get out?"

I asked the name.

"My name is Greeley Steele—is not that it? No—what was my name when over there? (meaning with me, as I supposed.) But, by G—d, I must get out of here."

This continued for about five minutes, when he exclaims, "I see a light," and was gone. At the same time, the bright light sank down behind her chair and disappeared. Previous to its disappearance, and while the influence was trying to get out, the red light became fringed with a deep blue color, which gradually extended over the red until all was blue, except a spot no larger than a pea in the center.

The solution of this as given by her influences is, that it was a contrived plan between them. They impressed her to speak of the magnet; they created the pain, and influenced her to place her hands on my head, by which means he was enclosed in her magnetism,—she taking him along with her, when they threw around him some kind of a magnetic current, which he could not pass, confining him in, their object being fourfold:

1.—To convince me of their existence.
2.—To do him good.
3.—To have a little fun.
4.—To weaken or destroy his influence over me, as they said he was a dark, mischievous spirit, which I do not doubt. I heard no more from him for a number of months. On inquiring what had become of him, was told that he was on the anxious seat, which may be true, provided they have such seats in spirit life, for when he returned, which he did last fall, there was manifest change for the better. But though Greeley was gone, I was not relieved, as he was only one of a number. They continued to torment me,—filling my mind with most horrible thoughts. I became irritable; the most trifling thing would throw me off my balance, and I began to fear the dethronement of reason.

The last night of 1869, some trivial matter had disturbed my equilibrium. My brain seemed in a state of fermentation,—thoughts most frightful, temptations most horrid, chased each other through my brain in rapid succession. I tried again and again to control them, without avail, or only for a moment. On retiring for the night, I resolved, most actually, to be left alone, fearing I should commit some crime ever after to be regretted. It made no difference whether my eyes were closed or open, the room was full of lights, and if ever a poor sinner at a Methodist revival, when psychologized by the priest, saw hell open to receive him, I did. That night prayed to Thomas Paine for aid and help, it came. Before morning, a calm succeeded the tempest. I sank into a refreshing sleep, and awoke with no traces of the scenes of the night before on me, only as they were burned into my memory, and the horrors of the last night of 1869, will never be forgotten. I stopped sitting for a few months, and have not been troubled since.

Now, if this experience will awaken thought, or be the means of throwing any light on the laws of spiritual development, you are at liberty to publish it. I only regret being compelled to use so many pronouns in relating it.

Green Garden, Ill.

To Dr. E. B. Wheelock.

I read your article, "Harmony vs. Inharmony," with much interest. Whether it was or was not meant as an indirect reply to me and my position, is of no consequence; we are both alike interested to have and to hold the truth. I but obey the golden rule in referring to a portion of it in the manner I am about to. In the article I read:

"As the human mind shall rise above the rudimental, and enter the spiritual, less and less will grow the scenes of inharmony, and less and less will it blame the world, and vice versa. The more grossly sensual a mind is, the more out of tune is the inharmony that it sees. Put such a man in search of God, and his composition and thoughts would be well stored with scenes of horror, and pictures of misery."

I once knew a man whose moral brain, both benevolence and justice, was marked by L. N. Fowler—"six and one-third," in a scale of one to seven. He had an unusually clear and deep sense of harmony and inharmony, of good and evil in all their forms, and was equally sympathetic with the sufferer. In the last years of my acquaintance with him, he seldom, if ever, blamed any body.

I once knew a man whose moral brain was marked—"three." He has little sense of, and is very indifferent to, "scenes of horror and pictures of misery." It is no doubt true that some gross minds look upon misery with a degree of unholy delight. But is it more often the bad, the heartless man, or the comparatively good, just and benevolent man, who has the clearest and deepest sense of all forms of evil, as well as of good? It can not be well to magnify either good or evil; either harmony or inharmony. Exact truth is wisest and best. I can not think that even blindness to inharmony results from a true growth of the soul, but its opposite. Nor can I think an idea of God which forces us to such conclusions as I understand friend Wheelock to advance in that extract, can be truthful.

Two hundred years ago, the orthodox New Englander had a personal God, such, being infinite, must of a necessity be infinitely happy. Of course ther, saints must be as near like him as possible. In their most popular poetry—I have a book of it before me—the mother in heaven is to feel no emotion other than joy on beholding her unbelieving son, daughter, husband, friend, or neighbor enduring the torments of hell. These good people could not have realized how much alike were their saints to their God, and how little pity for the sufferer. Both "rejoiced" on beholding him in suffering.

Am I—can I—be wrong in asserting that the more refined and spiritually elevated the soul, the more it must see and realize the inharmony that exists, and the more it will feel for, and sympathize with, a suffering world. In every age, have not those been most keenly alive to "scenes of horror and pictures of misery?" What ancient mind ever had a greater sense of inharmony than Jesus; or what modern than Wm. Lloyd Garrison? Jesus and Garrison are not samples of the "grass rudimental."

Friend Wheelock, if I have misunderstood the extract—I can not see it hardly possible that I have—or if you still think me in error, I invite you to correct me; while you write in love, do not fear to be personal. My self-esteem is full, but my desire for, and love of truth, is larger. I might be "grass rudimental" and not know it. I am not willful or wicked, I never allow myself to be ill, or to blame either gods or men. I would that you could step in and spend one hour, if not day, by my bed. I have never fully listed at the amount of physical suffering I have endured in sixty years and over. Yet I think I have suffered as much, even more, in sympathy with a suffering race. For over thirty years I felt myself a part of the same. I have suffered long with a world of wretchedness, discord, and poverty. I have experienced much and deep joy; but this did not blind me to, or harden my heart against, the sufferings of the many who were really much worse off than I for ever been.

I confess to you that some comparatively good men seem to me to make cruelly light of inharmony, and the sufferings it brings. In such cases, I always hope and pray that a more spiritual growth and a deeper experience may write a deeper compassion in the soul.

Should you tell me that each finite mind will rise free in its own inharmony, and be so far removed from the inharmony of others as to be nearly or quite forget it, and were I to admit this even provable, an infinite God could never become forgetful of, or blind to, the suffering he has caused, and is causing. If a God, he does, or does not sympathize with the sufferer. It is not—it can not be—out of order or improper for one to seek to know whether the believers in an infinite God have or have not realized anything in calling their God "father and mother," and talking of his "love, pity and compassion."

Fraternally,

Stockholm, N. Y., April 2nd, 1871.

P. S.—I am at this time in more deep personal afflictions, but do not admit that this improperly affects my article. I write to the reason of others, and ask all others to reply to my reason.

A. K.

Appreciative.

We are very much obliged to you, Brother Jones, for continuing to send the JOURNAL so long without payment, but am in hopes to send you a part, if not all of the bill soon.

Remarks:—Such expressions of gratitude and good intentions we prize higher than we do gold and silver, or greenbacks, and yet the material aid is all-important to the success of any enterprise upon the material plane of life.

—Twenty Spiritualists send us a certificate recommending Samuel Smyth, of Rockford, Ill., as a speaker and medium. We have no doubt he can well sustain himself in the capacity recommended by his friends.

A MANUAL OF

SPIRITUAL SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY

By Hudson Tuttle.

WITH FOREIGHT OF THE AUTHOR. Price $2.00; Postage 36c.

This work embodies the results of the author's researches and experience during the past twenty years, and is, without doubt, the most thorough presentation of the subject of Modern Spiritualism before the public.

Dealing, as it does, with a question in which the interest of all mankind is centered, it cannot fail to command universal attention.

While the experience of thousands will repudiate some of the conclusions the author arrives at, they will still be able to obtain much invaluable information from the book. It is a good book to place in the hands of every person who would know more of what it is that is waking the world to new hopes and aspirations, and planning a tree of life beside every man's door.

BY.....E. V. WILSON

Mediumship of A. J. Davis.

The following letters speak for themselves:

Dear Brother Davis:—I am about to enter into a discussion with Professor Bracket, of Carbondale, Ill, and I am informed that he expects to make much capital out of your "recantation" by our "anti-sensational" friend, the English Powell, of Spiritual Monthly notoriety.

I have but little personal acquaintance with you, and yet have read your works with interest and profit to myself, and I confess I can not see the "recantation." Will you oblige me by answering the following questions? You will understand I expect to see them. I shall not be offended if you refuse to answer them. I shall be more than pleased if you do answer. My discussion commences this evening, and will continue until the 18th inst. Questions:

1st.—Are you a Spiritualist, believing in man's demonstrable immortality?

2nd.—Have you ever seen a spiritual being that was once a mortal man, or human being, an inhabitant of our earth, through clairvoyancy or otherwise?

3rd.—Are you a medium for revelations from another and higher life, our spiritual existence?

4th.—Do you know that you are an immortal being, with ability to determine your immortality?

Please answer by return of mail.

Yours for the cause of humanity. Accept regards of

E. V. WILSON.

Cleveland, O., March 6th, 1871.

My Friend E. V. Wilson:—In reply to your kind letter of the 6th inst., I can freely and truthfully say that 1st.—I am a Spiritualist.

2nd.—I have seen, and held communion with persons who once lived on earth.

3rd.—I have at intervals in my life exercised the functional superficial phases of medio mship, and still continue to exercise these functions when occasion requires.

4th, and lastly. I know that death is not the end of my personal existence, and I believe in relatively that I am immortal.

In justice to me, Brother Wilson, I ask that you will state that the foundation of my own experience is clairvoyance, and the light I have received, that I have "recanted," or wish to exalt clairvoyance at the expense of mediumship, is wholly erroneous. My recent effort was directed toward the abuses and misapplications and absurd doctrines which prevail among people who have absorbed the wonders and delights of Spiritualism, and omitted the great ideas and rational principles upon which alone the world can ever accomplish much religious progress.

Hoping you will do yourself and the subject justice, I remain, your friend,

A. J. DAVIS.

Orange, N. J., March 10th, 1871.

Written for the Religio-Philosophical Journal.

Andrew Jackson Davis and Spiritualism.

MR. EDITOR:—Various articles have appeared from Spiritualists within a few months past which indicate a very general misapprehension of the attitude which A. J. Davis holds toward mediumistic Spiritualism, and also regarding the source of his inspiration. Most Spiritualists, it seems, regard Mr. Davis as a medium for spiritual communications from the spirit world. Some of them now think Mr. Davis did formerly claim to be a medium, but that he has recently abjured all such claims or relationships. Many persons, so the spiritual papers say, desire to hear from Mr. Davis in relation to these questions.

Mr. Davis has signified his disinclination to make superfluous replies to the various questions now being agitated respecting his mediumship, Spiritualism, and the source of his inspiration, and looks to the receivers and advocates of the Harmonial Philosophy to discuss these questions, and guard the cause of truth from whatever aspersions may be ignorantly or inadvertently cast upon it.

By your permission, I will give some quotations from Mr. Davis' works, which may serve to enlighten the people respecting the justice or injustice of some of the imputations recently made by different writers against Mr. Davis, viz.: that he has renounced and denounced mediumship; that he has made a recantation of important doctrines which he formerly taught; that he is no friend to mediums, and that he has "gone back," as the phrase is, on Spiritualism, etc., etc.

Commencing twenty-two years ago, I have read carefully every volume Mr. Davis has published, some of them many times over, and I fail to see in his latest work, "The Fountain," those glaring inconsistencies and contradictions of former works of that author, which many think they perceive, and so distinctly denounce. In nearly every volume Mr. Davis has written, he has given the reader some clue to, or explanation of, the manner in which he becomes possessed of the ideas and information which he imparts to the world. There is nothing in "The Fountain" that amounts to a "recantation" of, or even an inconsistency with, what he has uniformly stated regarding the source of his knowledge.

I can hardly remember the hundredth part of the explanations and illustrations Mr. Davis has given from time to time, concerning his intercourse with departed spirits, and the Spirit Land, the theory of his mental illumination, etc., and not having over one-half of his works at hand now, I must content myself with such portions of his writings as are available for the present purpose.

It must be borne in mind that Mr. Davis, in all his voluminous writings, claims to be in a state of mental development, which he terms the "superior condition," or of "spiritual illumination," and not in a state of mediumship, or of spirit control. In the superior condition, his mind is as independent of spirit control and as individually responsible for the mental manifestations, as when in the normal state. Perhaps more so, from the very fact of that state being the superior of any other mental condition. He was first a subject of mesmerism—then became clairvoyant, and finally advanced to the "superior condition," or state of seership, or spiritual illumination, in which state he has written his various works, not as an instrument or machine in the hands of departed spirits, but as an individual investigating, comparing, judging under and by virtue of, psychological laws and principles which are inherent in every human soul, (although undeveloped in most cases during earthly life.)

Premising the much of Mr. Davis' mental status, the reader will comprehend more readily the following language quoted from the "Great Harmonia," vol. 1st, p. 300:

"My interior experience has taught me to discriminate between spiritual perceptions and spiritual impressions. Spiritual perceptions are distinct from impressions, first, by being inferior to them, and, second, by being circumscribed and particular. Instantly upon entering the superior condition, the mind is in conjunction with a vast sphere of light; or else it comes in immediate contact with the electricity of the universe, which, like the sunlight with regard to the material eyes, is an agent or medium of perception to the spiritual eyes. For illustration, suppose I inwardly desire (or pray) to understand the situation of an individual in the tower of London. If this desire be intrinsically good, and if there is a use in it, then my spirit, by yielding to its internal promptings, is abstracted from surrounding objects and material influences. Directly subsequent to this equal-voluntary-self-abstraction, there emanates from the front brain, a soft, clear light,—unlike any earthly medium,—but which quickly merges into friendly relations with the electricity of universal nature; and forthwith I can see from the room in which I am now writing the individual in the tower of London. But if the desire has been located upon the inhabitants of one of the planets—Saturn, for instance—instead of upon an earthly person, my spiritual perceptions would have as rapidly carried that locality. As the telescope brings the planets comparatively within our grasp, even so do spiritual perceptions bring them as near to me, apparently, as is the distant landscape which the material eye can gaze upon.

"These spiritual impressions, enough can not be written, so valuable and exalting are they to the spirit of man! For illustration, suppose I carnestly desire to communicate to the world something respecting geology or astronomy. If this desire is intrinsically good and useful, it will be gratified. The superior condition is induced as above described—by a kind of semi voluntary self-abstraction. But instead of the soft, clear light darting in straight lines from the anterior brain to some particular locality of the earth, it ascends, like a cloud, or volume of light, a few feet from my head into the atmosphere, and there suddenly blends with the great sphere of light, which light proceeds from the concentrated intelligence of the spirit world, as from a mighty sun. This light is impregnated with the knowledge which I seek; it impresses my comprehensible intelligence; and it flows into the mind which is thus unfolded to receive it, as light and heat float from the visible sun into the objects and receptacles of earth. I was in this state when 'The Principles of Nature, Her Divine Revelations, and A Voice to Mankind,' were delivered to the world. That work could not have been prepared to mankind so early in my life had I not been assisted by another person's supporting and congenial influence. This influence, this quickening power, combined with my constitutional predisposition to spiritual illumination, enabled me to do that which without this influence, and under less favorable circumstances, I might not have accomplished before I attained my thirtieth year. But quickened into the superior condition by the manifold influences that were brought to bear upon me, such as magnetism, clairvoyance, etc., my spirit was enabled to continue to progress and unfold more and more, day by day, and hour by hour."

This was written by Mr. Davis twenty-one years ago, in 1850. The explanation, as here given by him, of the modus operandi by which he acquires his knowledge, does not admit of the theory of mediumism, or that he wrote any part of "Nature's Divine Revelations" by dictation of spirits. Mr. Davis has been used by spirits as a "medium" in the production of that work, or had he intended to convey any such impression, he certainly would have used other language than that above quoted to convey so simple a statement as that. Mr. Davis has had much personal intercourse with individuals in the second sphere, or Spirit Land; that such interviews have been often the means through which he obtained valuable test and spiritual edification and encouragement, his writings bear ample testimony; but such visitations and interviews have been simply fraternal and social, and not subjugational, or, as it is usually expressed, mediumistic.

On another occasion Mr. Davis gives the investigator further illustrations of the process or fountain source of his interior researches, which I will next quote from his autobiography, "Magic Staff," published about fifteen years ago (1856) in explaining the inspiration through which he was enabled to dictate "Nature's Divine Revelations," he says, p. 310.

"Yes, I obtained my 'impressions' from the ultimates, or spiritualized essences of objective nature.

"What do I mean by 'ultimates?' By ultimates I mean the products of primates. For illustration, you hold in your hand a peach. What is that peach? An ultimate. An ultimate is, what? Ah, now you become an incipient interior philosopher. The peach is an ultimate of a flower. Whence the flower? From a bud. Whence the bud? From a twig. Whence the twig? From a branch. Whence the branch? From a body. Whence the body? From a seed. Whence the seed? From spiritual forces. What are spiritual forces? From the divine fountain? Whence the divine fountain? Most exalted question! It will consume an eternal life to yield a correct answer.

"Or, take another illustration. My intuitions arise above New York, and I realize the presence of a certain impalpable ether. Whence that ether? From boiling water. Whence the water? From earth-bound gases. Whence the gases? From the forces of the earth. Whence the earth? From the sun. Whence the sun? From another sun. Whence that other sun? From a sun still greater and more remote. Whence that remoter sun? From a sun yet more inconceivable. Whence that still remoter sun? From the central sun of the Universe—um.

"Or, take a different example. My intuitions ascend like a light column of ether toward the upper realms, and I come in contact with an atmosphere of thought. Whence that atmosphere? From a congregation of professors, students and guests at Union College. Why that congregation? It is commencement day. What is the subject of the present speaker? The relation of Christianity to civilization. Whence Christianity? From the teachings of a person named Christ. Whence that person? Now, in asking myself this historical question I am greatly exalted. My intuitions become centered upon the myriad footmarks of human history; presently I strike the right vein. Then, true as the earth to the sun, I glide swiftly down the enormous grooves of Time, killing the intervening centuries as I pass, till I fix upon the exact events which preceded and characterized the birth and life of the individual under examination.

"In like manner every other question, scientific, ethical, psychical, poetical prophetic, literary, etc., with which I come into intuitional rapport—is subjectible to my voluntary investigation. And then from the minutiæ of any question which invariably contains the exact minutiæ and summary of its genesis, biography, incidents, properties, nature and relations, as well as the certain indices of its future destinations—I receive my 'impressions.' Whether I obtain them correctly or otherwise, is not a question which in part remains to be decided by my individual industry and love of truth while thus intuitionally exalted. I say 'in part,' because a certain proportion of such exercises can be truly explicated only by reference to the propitiousness of organization and hereditary inclinations.

"Thus I become, to some extent, individually responsible for my 'impressions,' and in the reception and translation of them, for my perception and use of language are also intuitional. I can greatly progress, or cease altogether, as my moral status and will may incline me.

"Still, then, you perceive the inestimable utility of the Magic Staff. And in view of the foregoing reliable explanation, how glaring becomes the misapprehension of those who advertise my statements as 'given through the mediumship of A. J. Davis.' As if my mind (while in the superior condition) were an insensible, unintelligent and passive substance, or spout, through which disembodied personages express or promulgate their own superficial opinions! This is an egregious error; a most unwholesome misrepresentation.

"The special influence and guardianship of spiritual beings are interpolated, so to speak, into the independently-written chapters of individual existence. Such is an impossible law of mediumship."

"And thus, amid the trials of life and the changes of death, the consolation is, not that we have been playing the part of insensate automatons under incessant inspirations from spirits, but that we are self-existent and responsible beings, and have added now and then by these providential agents, we have at last climbed to the summit of that rudimental mountain which enables us to step upon the less rugged acclivities of a yet higher and more happy world."

(The italics are Mr. Davis' own.)

E. F. BOYD.

Minneapolis, Minn., April 18th, 1871.

P. S.—Let all Spiritualists buy and study Mr. Davis' works. It will prove the best investment, both of time and money, they ever made. As a spiritual philosopher, they will find him not one always in the advance, but always progressive and far-seeing, logical, elevating, noble and fraternal, and such misunderstandings and misrepresentations regarding his attitude toward Spiritualism, would not arise.

E. F. B.

The Davenport Brothers.

The Davenport brothers are still traveling in the South, and like all other physical mediums, they have been frequently exposed; that is to say, they have often met with those who because they would not submit to every whim of their fancy, have cried "exposure!" Notwithstanding the frequent rumors of their exposure, they are excellent mediums, and doing in their way a grand good work. The following account, which we copy from the Sumter Republican, published at Americus, Ga., speaks for itself:

"These wonderful artists gave to the people of Americus a second performance on Tuesday night, to a fair audience. The exhibition is not claimed by the Davenports to be supernatural, or the agency of spiritual power; but they do not tell how the thing is done—of course not; that would spoil their trade. But, looking at the exhibition as the effect of natural causes, cultivated ingenuity and sleight-of-hand merely, it is no less wonderful and inexplicable by the most sharp and vigilant scrutiny than if ascribed to supra mundane influences.

"The question asked, how are these men able in so short a time—one minute by the watch—to untie themselves, and again, in the twinkling of an eye, almost, to fasten themselves with rope as before, cannot easily be solved by the spectators. The fact of such tying and untying is patent to all, but the way it is done is still a mystery to the uninitiated.

"The feat of throwing instruments about the cabinet, and out at the opening of the door, with such force as to reach beyond the platform—by men tied securely, hands and feet, to their seats, and a person sitting between them, tied to each, without the latter seeing or feeling any movement of the performers, was certainly a demonstrated fact, but the how is not one of the revelations.

"The last scene—that of stripping off the coat of Prof. Fay and putting on that of another person, while the Davenports were sitting ten feet distant, on each side, and held by the persons selected for that purpose, together with the throwing of the instruments in every direction, as shown by the phosphoric light previously placed upon them—was the climax of the marvelous. We do not believe that Prof. Fay threw those instruments. His hands were tied behind, and his limbs in front, and the knots of the rope were sealed with sealing-wax and stamped, and on examination afterwards no change was observable in the position of Mr. Fay's hands or feet. Some imp of darkness, whether mortal or otherwise, must have done the work so rapidly executed, and not a man tied to his position as was Mr. F. Such is our opinion at least.

"For eighteen years have these men been practicing these amazing feats of manipulation. There is no machinery—none of the paraphernalia of the wizard or magician—no wires, no concealed accomplices that have ever been detected. They have performed before crowned heads and inquisitorial and scientific conclaves, but never yet have the secrets of their exhibition been discovered, and of course the public are as much in the dark about it now as ever. Many ascribe the operations of the Brothers to demoniacal influences, others think they are spiritual manifestations, such as the hand seen to write on the walls of Belshazzar's palace, as recorded in the Bible, or the transfiguration scene, when Moses and Elias appeared to Christ and his three disciples, Peter, James, and John. But to one who is conversant with the various phases of spiritual phenomena, there is no identity between the latter and the former. The communications of the mediums, revealing the past, foretelling the future, and giving names, dates and facts recognizable by the recipient, are on a higher plain entirely, than any material or physical phenomena which have been exhibited here.

"If the Davenports have accomplished nothing else, they have certainly shown marvelous ingenuity, and taught us to respect the capabilities and powers which the Creator has bestowed upon his rational creatures. They have also confounded the wise in their own conceit and given us the demonstration that 'There are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in our philosophy.'"

PROF. HOWE'S

of

GRAMMAR.

The writer of this useful book has had a practical experience in the art of teaching of upwards of thirty years. He had long been impressed that a shorter pathway to grammar than that which led through the perplexing subtleties of the text books could be secured, and with much skill devised his "Seven-Hour system" of oral teaching. Appeals from his audiences and requests from correspondents abroad became so numerous and repeated, that he was compelled to put his ideas into print to satisfy the public demand. His discovering in the science are many and startling, reducing the labor, in many instances, from years to minutes. The limited governing power of the Transitive Verb from 30,000 words to seven; his relating or vibrating "S," securing syntactical agreement between the Verb and Noun; his exposition of the Subjunctive Mood and Proposition, with many other interesting features of the work, are not only original, but might with very great propriety be considered inspirational. These are of great value to the public writer, the platform speaker, the clergyman, or the senator. Fifteen minutes attention to any one of them will protect any intelligent person from erring once in a lifetime!

The work is got up in pamphlet form of about 50 pages, strong and neat covers, with large plain type, containing everything within, in its simplest essence, to constitute the Practical Grammarian. It is not sold for the value of the paper, print, or binding, but for the Seven-Hour grammatical science contained within.

Price:—cloth $1.00. Paper 50 cents. For sale by the RELIGIO-PHILOSOPHICAL PUBLISHING HOUSE, 187 & 189 S. Clark St., Chicago.

NEW EDITION—REVISED AND CORRECTED.

THE VOICES

Three Poems.

VOICE OF SUPERSTITION.

VOICE OF NATURE.

VOICE OF A PEBBLE.

By Warren Sumner Barlow.

THIS volume is startling in its originality of purpose, and is destined to make deeper inroads among sectarian bigots than any work that has hitherto appeared.

The Voice of Superstition is the words of the devil, and proven by numerous passages from the Bible that the God of Moses has been delegated by Satan, from the Garden of Eden to Mount Sinai.

The Voice of Nature represents God in the light of Reason and Philosophy—in His unchangeable and glorious attributes. While all other systems of theology, which another has erected a beautiful Temple on the ruins of Superstition. Judge Baker, of New York, in his review of this work, says: "I will engage to write a book in order to be classed among the ablest and most gifted didactic poets of the age."

The Voice of a Pebble delineates the individuality in matter and Mind, fraternal Charity and Love.

The book is a repository of original thought, awaking a new train of ideas, and is written in a bold, free, and fearless style, and is one of the few works that will grow with its years and mature with the centuries. It is already admired by the thousands of readers.

Printed in beautiful type, on heavy, fine paper, bound in beveled boards, in gold style; nearly 300 pages. Price $1.50, Postage 16 cents. Very liberal terms to the trade.

A BOOK FOR WOMEN;

TALKS TO MY PATIENTS,

BY

MRS R. B. GLEASON, M.D.

A book by a woman, for women, on the diseases of the sex. The LIBERAL CHRISTIAN, speaking of the book says:

"After reading the whole of this book, we pronounce it the most scientific and judicious work for a popular book for young people to read, for any body indeed, and this can be said of very few books devoted to such subjects. There is not a sentence in it that can be perverted to a bad use, so as to do any harm. We wish the book could be read in every household in our country."

Harper's Magazine says:

"We wish the chapter 'Confidential to Mothers,' might be published as a tract and sent to every Mother in the land."

Mrs. Dr. Sales says:

"I would rather have written that book than been queen of the greatest empire on this small globe of ours!"

Godey's Lady's Book says:

"This book treats in a thorough yet delicate manner of all the troubles, cares, and diseases of women. We do not hesitate to say that it is the best book of its class we have yet seen."

THE

Science of Evil;

OR

FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION.

BY JOEL MOODY.

—o:o—

THE SCIENCE OF EVIL is a book of radical and startling thought. It gives a connected and logical statement of the FIRST PRINCIPLES OF HUMAN ACTION, and clearly shows that without Evil there can be neither Morals, Science, Knowledge, or Human Action on earth. In fact, without Evil, man could not exist. This work fully solves the problem, and unveils the mystery of Evil, giving it a scientific meaning, and shows it to be THE LEVER WHICH MOVES THE MORAL AND INTELLECTUAL WORLD.

The book is a large 12 mo., of 343 pages, printed from large, clear type, on fine, heavy paper. Price, $1.75; postage, 20 cents.

SECOND EDITION.

A WORK OF GREAT RESEARCH.

ONE RELIGION: MANY CREEDS.

BY ROSS WINANS.

"We object to what the Church demands, an unbounded and unjustifiable confidence in the infallibility of the writings of Moses and the Prophets, and the Evangelists and Apostles. We dissent from a sentimental attachment to an impossible compound of God and man. We protest that Christian theology, as we have it, is not taught by Christ himself, nor by Christ himself, nor is it consistent with established facts, nor is it comprehensible by our reason. We would show that the Religion of Jesus is not Christianity, but better than other systems taught in other than Christian countries, and in some respects not so good.

The Religion of Jesus is the basis, we believe, of the creation of the world, has its counterpart also in the several systems of theology here mentioned. They all had their cosmology based on an equally good authority and evidence of truth, as that recorded in the Bible. The time and manner of the creation, no man has ever known, or ever will know, in this life; nor is such knowledge of importance in preparing us for the life to come."—EXTRACT FROM PREFACE.

This book is a large 12 mo. of nearly 400 pages, printed on fine, heavy-tinted paper, and is sold at much less than the actual cost. Price, $1.50; postage, 22 cents.

THE BIBLE IN THE BALANCE,

A Book for the Age and the Times,

and one that should be in the hands of every liberal man and woman in the land.

You want it for your own instruction, that you may be furnished with acknowledged authority to meet the arguments of the theologian, historian, chronologist and scientific man with his own weapons.

It discusses the matter of Bible canons, of versions, translations and of revisions with ability, citing many authors in the highest repute, and those that are above criticism.

The book is printed in excellent style, 12 mo., on new type and fine paper, with beautiful illustrations of the mounds and mound-relics of the Mississippi Valley.

It is substantially bound in cloth and contains three hundred and twenty pages.

The interest felt in the work is so great that orders were received for one-half of the whole of the first edition before it was published, one party alone having received orders for over three hundred copies.

A VISION.

BY R. T. M.

In these dreamy twilight hours,
I have earnest thoughts of thee.
Hope and fear and thankful fancy,
Light and shadow lead to me.

Ike some fair and noble city
In the crystal morning light,
Stars, temples, statues holy
Sunward gleaming on our sight.

Odors from the land of spices,
Flowers dyed with tropic beams,
Lights and sounds all richer, sweeter,
Than may haunt our brightest dreams.

So thy soul, as thus I ponder,
Seemeth to my spirit's eyes
Radiant with the haze of morning,
Fresh with airs of Paradise

But where blow the spiced breezes,
And where bloom the fairest flowers,
How the winds of death and blighting,
Serpent's trail amid the bowers.

And the fair and shining city
Il doth want and woe inhabit,
And its pride of pomp and power
Walketh hand in hand with sin.

Still the trust which man hath given
Liveth in my heart for thee,
And a glad and happy vision
Blesses all my soul to see.

As that fair and tempted city,
Golden with its sunward spires,
Altars hath whereon shall kindle
Holy sacrificial fires,

So thy soul, be thou but faithful,
Holier altar-fires shall glow,
Love that lighteth man to heaven.
Faith that bringeth heaven below.

Glorious music upward swelleth
From the city's throbbing heart:
So thy soul shall sound divinely
Symphonies of higher art.

Fresh from God's right hand the keynote,
He will grant the skill divine
Which shall waken glorious music
In this noble soul of thine.

RELIGIOUS.

Discourse by Florence McCarthy upon Priesteraft.—Lecture by J. R. Francis.

Florence McCarthy, pastor of Union Park Baptist church, delivered an eloquent sermon on last evening to a large audience from the text:

"And the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom."—Mark xv, 38.

The discourse was substantially as follows:

There had always been, in every age of the world, a priesthood. They had been found in New Zealand, the Society Islands, among the Brahma Islands, in China, in Persia, in Egypt, in Greece and Rome, and among the Jews. The Jewish priesthood was coeval with the human race. Cain and Abel were priests. Enoch, Noah, and Abraham were priests. The patriarchs were all priests. But the Jewish priestcraft properly began with Aaron. He and his sons were set apart by God as the priesthood of the Jewish nation. The priesthood was intimately connected with the tabernacle, which was a movable tent used by the Jews during their wanderings in the desert. The tabernacle was divided into two apartments. The smaller was called the holiest place, and the larger the holy place. In the holiest place was the ark of the covenant, and the shekinah. In the holy place there were the altar of incense, the table for the shew bread, and the golden candlestick. In the open court around the tabernacle was the altar of burnt offerings. Solomon's temple was a permanent structure to take the place of the tabernacle. The great function of the high priest was performed once a year, on the great day of the Atonement, when he entered the holiest place and made atonement for the sins of the whole people. The ordinary priests performed the menial labor of sacrifice and incense. The Levites were the hewers of wood and the drawers of water for the priests. A priest, then, was a man without whom men could have no intercourse with God.

Under the new dispensation, Jesus Christ was the successor of the high priest, and His followers were the successors of the ordinary priests. At least it was obvious from many passages of scripture that they were so figuratively, and that the Jewish priesthood was abolished. This accorded with the text.

When the Lord Jesus gave up the ghost, and entered the heavenly world, the veil of the temple which concealed the holiest place and symbol the priesthood, was rent in twain from top to the bottom. This idea was made the of the organization of the Christian church, accordingly was patterned, not after the e, but after the synagogue which had no s. There, was therefore, no priesthood in the church.

The function of the elders, as such, was simply government. After the lapse of time there arose a hierarchy which developed into the papacy and the priesthood. The resemblance of a Catholic church to the temple was obvious. The holy place and holiest place, the candlesticks, altar of incense, and shekinah were all reproduced. The Catholic clergy, like the Jewish priests, must be from bodily blemish and be consecrated. The Pope was the great reservoir of grace. It ran through him into the cardinals; thence unto the archbishops; thence unto the bishops; thence into the presbyters, and thence into the deacons, where anyone could tap with a shilling and get a supply.

And this same Catholic church was the mother of us all. Baptists think they are an exception, and they have lived in the Waldenses through all the centuries. But this is a strange conclusion. The Lutheran church and the church of England split off from the Catholic church; the Presbyterian from both of them; from the Presbyterian the Independent; from the Independent the Congregationalist; from the Congregationalist the Baptists. Waldensian missionaries brought the Baptist torch to England, but the fagots had been Catholics. Alas! alas! all were tarred with the same stick. The only difference was that some had removed more of the tar than others.

In proportion as we pass from the Catholic church through the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, Independent, and Congregational to the Baptists, the ear-marks of Rome fade, but not entirely. Many proofs of this might be cited. What the speaker wished particularly to point out was that the priesthood in an attenuated form survived in all the Protestant sects. For instance, how few persons understand the significance of ritualism. It was founded not merely in a love of display. It were well for it at the day of judgment if it were. It was a crusade against the priesthood of believers in the interest of a clerical priesthood. It was founded on the heresy of trans-substantiation, and even that for the reason that it involved the priesthood. What mean their gowns, and birds, and albs, and copes, and what not? They meant the tunic, and breastplate, girdle, and so forth of the Jewish high priest.

Ritualism was not a mere question of millinery, but an audacious assault upon the liberty and equality of God's people. It was priestcraft. Some of the leading fruits were bigotry and persecution. These charlatans would have us believe that when they place a drop of water on the forehead of a baby, they can regenerate its soul, and when one of them dared to deny it, his high priest forbade him to officiate as a priest, and degraded him from the priesthood; then tried to get his temple and altar away from him. What a disgusting travesty on the religion of Jesus, and yet, if Mr. Cheney did not want to be a priest, why did he join the priesthood?

And what mean the gowns, and bands, and surplices of the low-church Episcopal ministers? What mean the administration of the sacrament to kneeling communicants and confirmation? That they are all priests. What mean their absolution and benediction? That they are priests, and that no man could come to the Father but by them.

And yet the Episcopal ministers are at least consistent. They call themselves priests, and priests they are. Ministers of other denominations deny that they are priests, and practice priestcraft. What is the origin of funerals in churches—of the idea that ministers only could administer the ordinances, or even pronounce a benediction? It might be shown that these and many other things were the attenuation of Romish practices.

And then, said the speaker, consider how the personnel of Protestant ministers apes at priesthood. As the regalia of the Jewish priesthood was reproduced in the toggery of Catholicism, so was this toggery copied in the vestments of St. Albans; the vestments of St. Albans in the gowns of the low-church Episcopalians, and these gowns in the long tail military coat, the vest buttoned to the throat, and white choker of other Protestant ministers—all meaning the same thing—a priest, a mediator between God and man. The cane might be said of their black walking-stick, clean-shaven faces, the sanctified pattern of their whiskers, their stately carriage, their affected drawl, and the holy tone of their preaching, copied evidently from the nasal intonation of the Catholic priesthood.

Said the speaker:

"Never was my disgust so profoundly excited as it was a few days since, by the sight of a bevy of Protestant priests. They had come in from the rural districts at the whistle of their high priest in the city, to aid in the humiliation of a recusant priest of their connection, who lived several hundred years in advance of them in thought and ability. It was my misfortune to see these creatures sitting together around a hotel table, and as I sat and scanned their funeral costumes, relieved by white cravats; the religious cut of their hair and whiskers; their wide mouths and retreating foreheads; their pale, flabby, imbecile, eunuch-like countenances; their saucy, self-important air, and their marvelous appetites, I looked to heaven and mentally exclaimed, 'O Lord! how long shall Thy church be in the hands of priests, and Thy people be priest-ridden?' While the apparition was before me, I felt stifled with the atmosphere of dark ages; the walls of the room suddenly took the semblance of a cloister; the high-back chairs looked like kneeling places and monks; the dirge-like voice of a pagan out of doors was transformed into an intoned vesty, and as one of these clerical inquisitors brandished his silver spoon, I verily thought I witnessed the elevation of the host. But thanks to a kind Providence the scene dissolved, and like nightmare left no trace but revolting memories. Take them all in all, I ne'er shall see their like again, I hope."

And how much was indicated by the very titles of ministers. Think of the Protestants being called reverend, when Catholic priests are called right reverend and very reverend. Think of him writing his name on a hotel register or on his card, as "The Rev. Silas S. Head." What war it may mean, or not mean, the man knows that it is one of the badges of priesthood, and often a think of priestcraft.

It sometimes happened that even a Baptist pastor sinks so low as to practice priestcraft, and affect to be a priest. That he will don a priestly gown, condescendingly bless the people to a benediction; write "Reverend" on his cards; smother himself in black dry goods up to the neck and down to the heels, except a bit of white at the throat, to make his head look like a rosette on a coffin; that he will speak in an affected tone of voice, and in a tiresome celestial phraseology, and so entirely absorb all spiritual functions in himself that his people begin to doubt whether they can hold a prayer-meeting or say grace before meat without their pastor. Catholics and Episcopalians had their excuse that they had been brought up to believe in priestcraft, and had always lived surrounded by it. But for the Baptist man, who was in theory, at least, the ultimate stage of reaction from Rome, who was the very ne plus ultra of Protestantism, who aspired to be considered one of the Waldenses, and as uncorrupted with Roman contagion—for this man to dress himself in funeral black, and flaunt his priestly title in Protestant faces—this, indeed, was despicable and unpardonable.

In the throng of Baptist pastors who would visit our city this week, there [illegible] be at least fifty priests, "and O!" said the speaker, "you can not imagine how I shall groan and sigh for a hogshead of dishwater, and [illegible] all of them over again in their native [illegible]. How cheerfully would I bury them [illegible] Protestant scorn that they would [illegible] make their appearance among C[illegible] their own priests, and who ha[illegible] Jesus. I never see a m[illegible] that I do not involuntarily place [illegible] my pocket-book, for, unless they [illegible] weak in their understanding, rest[illegible] are weak in their morals."

Let our pastors adopt the language of Lawrence:

"I am a man! and regard nothing human or foreign to me."

When men were disposed to worship them, let them say with John: "See thou do it not, for I am thy fellow servant; worship God." If they would be reverenced, let them become learned; let them live blameless lives; let them show a Christ-like temper; let them dress like other decent men; let them eat and sleep like other men; let them heed the instructions of Falstaff to ancient Pistol: "If thou hast any tidings further, deliver them like a man of the world;" let them say to the world: "I can do you no good but what one plain Christian man may do to another. I am imperfect, fallible, sinful. I have imprinties, faible, faults, like every body else. I do not wear the keys of heaven at my girdle. I am not a priest and do not affect to be, by speech, habit, or mannerism. I claim no titles, and exact no respect except from those whom I surpass in intelligence and personal worth."

After all, many might like him less for it; for most people, at heart, rather like a priest, but O! what a welcome he would get from his Master in the world to come. In the last day, when gouty bishops shall waddle up to the judgment seat with their mitres and crosses, he would say to them as Cromwell said to the speaker of the house of commons, concerning the royal scentre, when he dissolved the long parliament: "Take this bauble hence." Turning upon the priests, tricked out in satin and tinsel, he would say: "Aaron I know, and Caiaphas I know, but who are ye? Who commissioned you to lord it over My heritage; to teach My people that heaven could not smile or frown, except through your pampered, expressionless visages? Who told you to stand between My saints and My table or the waters of baptism, or to pronounce blessings and grand absolution? Who made you priest any more than any one of My ransomed people, one and all of whom are more priests than you, because you are children of the devil? Depart, depart."

And while these deceivers are covered with shame, the real servants of Christ, who were content to be men and not gods, who dressed like other people, and ate and talked like human beings, and spent their lives in self-denying labors of the Christian pastorate, would be crowned with glory and honor. "They shall be mine," saith the Lord of Hosts, "in that day when I make up My jewels." "They shall shine as the stars forever and ever." "They were content when on earth that I should be their prophet, and priest, and king; they shall be kings and priests unto God and my Father forever and ever."

From the Chicago Daily Times, May 18.

A crusade against the preachers seems to have been inaugurated in Chicago. When two such opposites as a Baptist minister and a Spiritualist lecture twice, on the same Sunday evening, in the effort to break down the barrier which is supposed to exist between the world's worldliness and the priest's holiness, there must be something in the wind. Such was substantially the case on last Sunday evening. The Spiritualist naturally went a little further than the Baptist. The inference from his discourse was that the preachers are not only not any better than the rest of the people, but not even so good. In support of his theory, he proceeded to rake up some of the scandals which the pulpit has furnished lately—and it must be admitted that the pulpit has been very productive of these; he showed the inconsistency of those men who advance from bowling Methodism to the most extreme liberalism, or recede from the latter to the former; and, finally, he concluded that progress was the only true religion, and every man could be his own priest in the progress of Spiritualism.

The Baptist speaker took a mild ground, which is much more conservative and reasonable. He insists that his brother preachers shall throw off their cloaks of priesthood, that they shall meet their congregation as man to man, that they shall confess themselves to be human and frail, as well as the rest of the world, and that, in a word, they shall not claim special immunity and particular godliness because they happen to have chosen the profession of the pulpit. This doctrine cannot fail to meet with the approval of the secular community, but it will scarcely be so well received by the clerical cloth. The cut of the coat and the sanctimony of the expression, frequently go further than all the other accessories of a distinctly office. Take away from your preacher the traditional idea of the sanctity and authority which are so mysteriously attached to his office in the minds of his people, and the growing individuality of the day in religious matters will broaden into scepticism, which the priesthood would find it a difficult matter to control. It is almost too much to expect of the preachers that they will voluntarily yield up the advantages of a privileged class.

The Spiritual lecturer referred to, is John R. Francis, Associate Editor of the JOURNAL. An abstract of his lecture will be published in the next issue.

It gives us pleasure to know that the position so often taken by us in regard to the assumptions of Theology, are fully corroborated by Professor [illegible], an eminent minister of the Baptist denomination.

Quite a number of Spiritualists have been infatuated with the machinery of organization, if not with its toggery. A ritual, even, has been recommended, and in a few instances introduced and used, until that bold Iconoclast, E. V. Wilson, exhibited its ridiculous features so forcibly that it was suddenly dropped.

While it has been denied that there was an intention to put forth a creed, or confession of faith, by those would-be national organizers, yet the only paper that assumed to be the organ of the "American Association of Spiritualists," the Present Age,—now defunct, as is virtually the institution it was the mouth-piece for—did openly avow itself in favor of organization, with a creed, etc.

Certain Spiritualists who have come out from church organizations, yet retain that shallow appendage or prefix, Reverend, which under the showing of Mr. McCarty, is ridiculous even while a man holds fellowship as a minister of any denomination, but how much more ridiculous in one who has renounced such faith, given up his credentials, gone out from them, and become a Spiritualist!

Let Spiritualists kick to it well, last, if they be of being in the front ranks of all reforms, they find themselves stuck fast to some American or some other fossilized association, while Mr. McCarty, Henry Ward Beecher, and other leading minds assume the reins, and lead in guiding the car of reform.

The JOURNAL will, as heretofore, faithfully protest against every movement that shall tend to fossilization, or cripple freedom of thought, and will give its readers the benefit of the thoughts and expression of independent thinkers, without regard to their special fields of labor.—[ED. JOURNAL.

RELIGIOUS MANIA.

A Singular Case at Kalamazoo, Mich.

Last fall, a man named John Heisler, a German umbrella maker, was, after much difficulty and great resistance, arrested and confined in the asylum for the insane. For months previous, himself and family had carried on at their house in the extreme north part of the village, on the edge of the swamp, a series of crazy freaks wonderful to behold, and which attracted to his humble abode, great crowds of people, much to the frenzy of Heisler, who would attempt to drive off all who came. He seemed sane enough on other subjects but religion, but on that, he and his whole family, consisting of a wife and five children, are soaring mad. The house was all ornamented with crosses, and these they paid devotion to. A deformed daughter was placed every day upon the housetop, and then all the others of the family would kneel and worship her.

At intervals, they would all go out into the open field and pray aloud for hours at a time. These and a great many other eccentricities, excited the curiosity of the people. It was unsafe for people to pass, for Heisler would often assault them, and his neighbors complained of the family as a nuisance. If food had not been given them, and that forced on them, they would have starved to death. When the police and poor-master went to the house, it became necessary to force their way in.

Finally it was decided to arrest Heisler and place him in the asylum and see what the effect would be on the family. He remained there two or three weeks, and Dr. Van Deusen said that he was sound in all other respects save a religious mania, and on his suggestion, he was allowed to come and go to the institution as he wished, and after a while he did not come back. Since then, up to the present, Superintendent Brownell has provided the family with all the necessaries of life, and with him have visited the afflicted family frequently. Citizens of the village, who in many ways befriended the Heislers.

But the same religious frenzy, though somewhat subdued, has prevailed with all the family through the winter, and two weeks ago they refused to accept charity, or any food whatever. For days together they have locked themselves in their shanty, and refused all visits of outsiders to enter, the old man keeping stout hickory clubs and a loaded gun at hand. To prevent starvation to these six unfortunates,—all the children are in some measure deformed, and one is but a very small babe,—Superintendent Brownell had recourse to stringent measures. He reasoned that they should not starve if he could prevent it, he went to the house with some Germans who were friends of the Heislers, and by force of cold-an entrance. A terrible picture of suffering met the gaze of the visitors, but the family refused to receive any food or assistance unless it were given in the name of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. Mr. Barney Lechner was among those who visited the place with Mr. Brownell, became so indignant at what he saw that he seized the crosses and emblems that were to be seen on every side, and broke them in pieces.

Every effort was made for a week afterward, by daily visits, to induce the family to partake of food, but with only partial success, and only on the [illegible] of bread.

Yesterday Mr. Brownell decided to arrest [illegible] if he could have him put into the [illegible] and by separation of the family, put an end to this strange delusion, which must otherwise soon result in the death of the entire family.

It is one of the most obstinate cases on record; the efforts of the Catholic priest, of Heisler's old friends, and of others, to provide for the wants of himself and family, and to aid in every way, have had no effect.

The old man Heisler is to have an examination this morning before Justice Allen, to see what can be done in respect to committing him to the work-house as a vagrant. He will probably make no defense whatever, probably not open his mouth.

Kalamazoo, April 22d.

P. S.—Heisler has, since my last was written, been tried by a jury on the charge of vagrancy, and sentenced to one year in the house of correction. He must eat now or go to glory on an empty stomach.

He still refuses to eat. Mr. Brownell went to the house yesterday afternoon and took the woman and children to the county-house. She changed her views decidedly, and begged hard, saying she would feed the children and not act so any more, but it was thought best not to yield to her importunities.

Educational.

It was our good fortune to visit a Seminary in the little town (with a city government) of Belvidere, N. J., a short time ago, and we believe the system in operation there, much nearer a model institution for the, to many, odious place—a boarding school,—than most Seminaries of the kind. It was originally started for a girls' school. They will excuse us for not calling them "young ladies," but we found there, that rara avis in our American society—genuine girls—and many very fine specimens at that.) Within a year or two, the system adopted at that institution, has attracted so much attention, that boys have almost been crowded upon the proprietors, and the have made arrangements for a limited number.

When pupils are sent from their parents to this school, they are sent to a home. There is no impassable gulf between professor and pupil, no separate tables and different fare, but like a pleasant family all meet together at their meals, the same fraternal plan is followed throughout. The lessons are elaborated and explained for the purpose of having them understood. The pupil is encouraged by pleasant incentive, instead of forced by puritanic command; the hours of recitation are pleasant and profitable; not a place where pupils are frightened out of all they have studied, by frowns and severe looks, threatening punishment for the slightest misunderstanding. Out of school hours, the garden, the field, the woods, are made playgrounds wherein the professors and pupils obtain strength of body and improvement of mind by a study of nature and its wonderful books. In a word, the whole plan, in teaching, in government, in recreation and in opinions, might well be summed up in the words "liberty, equality, fraternity;" but the liberty does not mean license, the equality is not undue familiarity, and the fraternity is not impudence and presumption. It is a regulated fraternity, polite, respectful, considerate. We ask the question: "Do you know any discontented boarders here?" The prompt reply was: "not one, we all feel at home here." We think few boarding schools could find its boarders so unanimous.

Another very important matter in this school is the discouragement, rather than the encouragement of extravagance in dress. The attention paid to frivolity, fashion and dress, in so many boarding schools for girls, is a very serious object to them. Here, the inside of the head is deemed of more importance than the outward adornments, the health of the body more cared for than the fashionable cut of the apparel. Health of body and mind is the aim of the institution and great care is taken to develop the powers and faculties of both.—Williamsport, Pa. Gazette.

The above named school is under the supervision of sister Bell Bush, a lady of talent, and an outspoken Spiritualist.—[ED. JOURNAL.

ROSICRUCIAN MUSINGS.

By F. H. Dowd.

(Concluded from last week.)

Now first, as regards sense as the foundation of belief. Blindfold a person, and expose him to heat, or anything which arouses attention—fumes of chemicals, for instance—and immediately belief is formed in the mind as to the cause or source of that which is sensed. Let a person smell the aroma of a rose,—who has never seen one,—and he will believe in something as the source of the fragrance; but when you have removed the bandage from his eyes (ignorance), and shown him the rose, the belief disappears, and knowledge takes its place, i. e., mind is satisfied. So the physical mind senses the aroma of spirit, and believes in its source, but when spirit is seen, felt and talked to, the spiritual mind is satisfied,—it knows,—and immediately faith is established in the things known. This sense of spirit comes not to the mind, save the doors of physical sense are closed and the ear of the mind opened to mental things, voices, and sounds.

Belief and knowledge go hand in hand, as body and mind are inseparable; but faith is not of the mind—no more than mind of the body, or knowledge of the mind. To the body belongs sense and belief; to the mind thought and knowledge; to the spirit, all of these in an ultimated condition (which is not belief nor knowledge), which I call faith. This has no knowledge nor belief; neither doubt nor investigation, but a blind trust, a peaceful confidence and rest, void of fear or want. The mind is the connecting link between body and spirit; it is a dread-like film between two opposite conditions of the same thing, wherein the world of matter with its sights, its sounds, and its contact beats out the discord of human life. But when this drum is turned away from the light of knowledge—away from this world of motion and matter—angel hands caress its still surface, discovering sweet, ravishing melody of which the world knows nothing.

As it takes the outside world in contact with the body to cause sense and inspire belief, so it is with mind. The universe of mystery and wonder beat out the discord of knowledge which we call sublime music.

All the knowledge that has been acquired throughout the countless ages is not worth a straw unless it has added to man some lasting and abiding happiness. All the mental acquisitions of man are nothing unless they have taught him his utter helplessness and dependence. Schools of science and art, of philosophy and religion, are mere child's play unless they have taught man that the highest knowledge possible to acquire is the knowledge of mind's relationship to all. Not only this, but they must teach that relationship, and render it practicable to all.

Let us pause here and ask, if all the knowledge of the world has made man better. Has it made him more philanthropic? Has it increased brotherly feeling among men? No! on the contrary it has robbed the world of charity, and created distinctions false and heartless, vast gulfs of pride and dignity, which divide man from his brother, and provoke war, crime, disease and unhappiness.

Even the churches have fallen into the same slough of knowledge, and the pretended followers of him who said: "He that believeth shall be saved," etc., have no faith in anything at all, only in paltry earthly possessions and the knowledge pertaining thereto. It is this of which I complain,—the prostitution of the Cross, of manhood and freedom, to such abject and servile slavery.

The world has no faith save in material things and the knowledge thereof. Why? Because no man can have faith in spiritual things until he has a knowledge thereof; and the world has not even belief in spiritual things, unless mental assent may be called belief. You ask here, what is belief in spiritual things? Is it belief in the communion of spirits? I answer, No! These spirits are beings like you and I, only in other conditions. They are as much of earth as we; are as low and vile as any. What, then, do you mean by spiritual loves and beliefs? I mean ideal love; spirituality is unselfishness. This is the first step of spirituality,—love of the wonderful and sublime, the mysterious and supernatural.

To believe is to love or fear. Here, then is a guide. If we believe in a thing that we fear, we know that that belief leads to misery or hell. It is the absence of love which produces fear. Love in hell would make it heaven. To believe is to have. There is no such thing as impossible. The possible is the probable. If our belief gives us joy, peace and rest, we know we are on the true road. If we increase in manhood, liberty, and power, we know we are progressive, and by virtue thereof may reach any condition of power that we aspire to.

To believe in God is a supernatural belief. I will show you why. We believe and have faith in those we know—our friends, for instance. We believe in and fear our enemies whom we know. We love our friends in whom we have confidence and trust. This is a very small circle of an infinite number of circles which we must love in order to love God, or in order to believe in God, in such a manner as to destroy fear. Fear is torment. "Fear hath torment," and how believe in them, what merit have you? Love of individual things is not love of God. No love less than love of all things and all conditions is love of God; for God is all. He who hates cannot love, for the love he may have is only lust. Now in proportion as you love all you become indifferent to individual things. This indifference is destruction to all loves. Nothing can survive th's destruction that belongs to earth. Love of all is love of none, consequently this may not properly be called love. I call it such for the reason that we recognize love as the highest attribute of the human soul, and be cause of the ecstacy that thrills the whole being like waves of sweetest harmony upon a softened spirit. Ah, God! who can palpt or picture with words or pen the sounds, weird and strange, the softly modulating rapturous music which steals along the empty chambers of a body whose soul is turned away from earth,—whose contact it feels not, whose sounds it hears not, and whose light is as darkness, and meeting here in the mind—all empty of earthly loves—the infinite spirit sinks low, and sobbing with bliss, into caressings and touchings, handshakings and kissing, with lips whose touch dots fill the being with longings, with fire which burfleth lust as stubble,—whose lingering pain (in the waking state), earth's ecstacy of joy is far, very far inferior to.

No man can believe and have confidence in God, until he believes and has confidence in all his creations.

To distrust man is to distrust God. Why? Because through his works we reach him. Reader, how much of distrust, of doubt and fear, have you got to wade through before you arrive at that overarching condition of belief and trust in all men and all conditions? If your love for friends gives peace and joy, why not extend your circle? "Why!" you answer, "the world is so deceitful and false! I have no confidence in it. How can I love those who hate and distrust me? Their very looks disturb me, and fill my soul with disgust! I fain would hide away in some recladed nook, from the faces of man. Nature I love, but man makes me afraid. I look in his eyes, but I don't know what I see. Strange lurid lights are burning there, which with fitful gleams, picture deceit and horrid crime on the vacant air—this makes me afraid!"

Listen a moment, friend, I have searched the arcana of nature and of man from infancy to old age,—from the womb to that other womb we call the grave,—to find, if possible, what there is of man that is commendable, and presentable to the Infinite. In other words, what is worth saving from universal destruction. I find in man only one thing lovable, and that is, love of his kind, and that which is dependent on him. In the bosom of all mankind, I find a little of this; and the more extended this love, the greater the man is. I have found that in this love, dwells POWER. Selfishness is weakness. Power to control one's self, comes of charity. If you have charity for a man, how can you be angry at, or afraid of him? As you love objects, so do you draw the spirit of that object to you, and its hidden power plows into and around you, giving you more and more power, not only over yourself, but over the thing loved. Then why not love your enemies? for in so doing, you add them to your circle, becoming great thereby. God loves the Devil,—i. e., if he loves at all,—for to love a part, is less than infinite.

To war with your fellow, is to war with yourself. You respect yourself in proportion as you respect others;—forget self in proportion as you forget individuals in universals. To love individuals is to gain in power, and to love in proportion to the unselfishness and extent of that love; so also to love all things, is to have all power, all of joy, and rest. This is not difficult, if you only know how. To control one's limbs, lungs, stomach, eyes, nerves, etc., is the first thing; this brings health. To control one's mind,—its limbs, passions, emotions, thought, or—and to acquire the power of concentration and abstraction, is the second thing; this brings the mind to that softened, flexible state, wherein the gestation of spiritual or unselfish loves is commenced and carried on,—to that state of turning, as it were, on a pivot, and looking within one's self. He who can look within himself need not be afraid of the ghosts therein seen, need not fear God nor the Devil.

To control one's spiritual nature,—to bend ones prejudices, likes and dislikes, to love as one wills, and forget doubt and fear,—is the work of a God, yet it is man's privilege to be a God.

To fashion matter, to build cities and subdue the earth, is the result of mental and physical control. To analyze matter, and combine and classify its elements, is the work of mind, with less of physical control. To create conditions and control them; to mould and fashion one's own spirit and give it quality; to make telegraphic lines to remote places so as to speak and be heard; or make telescopes to scan the realm of infinity, and voyage to unnoted depths; to make railways and ride thereon to spiritual heavens or hells, and the starry world of space; or wings wherewith to soar beyond the march of passion's tempestous realm; to stand unmoved amid the glare of lightnings, hell vomited—eye! and to hold as in one's hand potent spells before which tyrants upon bowed knee and helmet to obey—these are the high prerogatives of man, when he learns to control his own spirit. All this physical, mental, and spiritual control, comes of thought controlled.

Take time to think before speaking or acting; this is the beginning. Keep silent when others are boisterous and aggravating. Keep cool always. Say to the waves of emotion, from whatever cause, "Peace, be still!" and it shall be done, for the strong will is all-powerful. Turn away from rage as a thing unworthy of notice. There is more courage in daring to be called a coward, than in all the contentions of the world. Secure your own self-respect, and then keep it, and all will do you homage. Life is too short to waste upon trifles.

Wretched, indeed, must that man be, who has no hope beyond wrath and the power it brings. It hath been said by one of old, that "There is a natural body, and there is also a spiritual body;" but no one hath told me aught concerning the latter. I now say, that the spiritual body does not exist until it is created by the loves of the individual. Unselfish ideal love is its food and strength, or, in other words, the power of attraction resides in this, wherein the will works in the spirit to combine and organize the spiritual body. This body is not for all men.

Most men have only one body. The body which is organized after death is not a spiritual body; it is material, and subject to laws, the same as all matter, only in different conditions; while the spiritual body of which I speak is formed of the spiritual forces of mind, here or not at all. Its elements are matter, it is true, but perfectly under the control of the will, and may be made visible or not, at will, to pass through matter and space without hindrance, and is not subject to the laws of matter. This body acts, sees, senses, and knows altogether above and beyond all modes with which we are acquainted. It sees not as the eye sees, to distance, but hears any distance without sound—senses without contact, knows without thought, investigation or reason. Its power over matter is indeed infinite. GOTAMA, BUDDHA, APPOLONIUS and CHRIST had this spiritual body in different degrees of perfection, which they could by effort of will bring with them to earth. Some men have such a body half-organized, following them around in weakness, languishingly unknown to them, which draws its vitality from them while they sleep. CHRIST spoke of this body, when he said, "I and my Father are one." It was within him at the time, and spoke the words—indeed it was this spiritual body which he called his father, and not the body. They are not two individuals, but one, with the power to separate or unite at will.

To believe in this second self or spiritual body, is to give it strength to perfect its organization and powers. When fully matured, the individual has what has been called, and which I call supernatural power. There are none such now on the earth, albeit, there are many in embryo. It takes ages upon ages, and births innumerable, to mature the spiritual body; yet it is deathless from the first. Born of love, God's first and only begotten son, it can not die. I have written it, let the world make a note of this as it laughs. I might demonstrate the truth of the foregoing, but to such as ask it, I say, the kingdom of heaven opens not to those who ask a sign; but to the believing, the sorrowing spiritual minded ones,—those whose pathway has been strewn with brambles and thorns, and whose life-cup has been filled with gall, and yet who have trusted and looked ever upward through tears, these are the eye-witness words of such will be not a sign, and such will know as they read that heaven is not a myth, although past investigation.

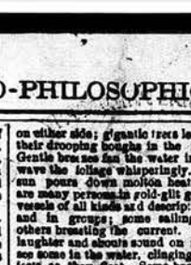
To be a Spiritualist is more than the mere belief in the communion of disembodied people. To be spiritual is to be unselfish. This is all of any value—all that is eternal of us. This leads us to learn, not by rules, but by the spirit control. Learn us to believe in all things, to doubt not, and to pursue our even way, not looking to the right nor to the left. This is the way, walk ye therein!

I was about to close this article, when, as if by magic, a magnificent river flows past my feet. Its waters are dark, swift, and eddying its current; a mighty forest stands dark and gloomy on either side; gigantic trees lean over and trail their drooping boughs in the rushing waters. Gentle breezes fan the water into ripples, and wave the foliage whisperingly. Overhead the sun pours down molten heat. On the river are many persons in gold-gilt pendolas, and all vessels of all kinds and descriptions, both singly and in groups; some sailing downward and others breasting the current. All are gay,—laughter and shouts sound on my ear. I also see some in the water, clinging to various objects as they float. Some have life preservers, others a plank,—others have rafts, while many are naked, swimming for life; but more seek the shore. The swift current bears them swiftly away, but still they come, as if the whole world had gone bathing or pleasure riding.

What is that I see at the bend below? One man naked, without buoy or assistance of any kind, swimming against the current. He draws nearer. The others drift past, and shouts of derision hail him on all sides. As he draws near to me, I see—MYSELF! Great drops of sweat stand on his body as he deals great strokes at the eddying waters as they rush past. His eyes are fixed; he turns not to the right hand nor to the left. "Fool!" greets him on all sides from swimmers and sailors alike. He pays no attention to them. One says, as he passes in his boat beautifully modeled and caparisoned, reclining upon soft cushions:

"My dear sir, don't you know the folly of swimming against this current? Turn and go with the stream! It is so pleasant to float and bask! You don't know where you are going no more than we! Why not take it easy?"

But he is gone without a reply. The bold swimmer seems to be deaf.



As he draws near, I question him, and am surprised to hear him answer. Here is what he said: "I have been six hours and years in reaching this stream. It is the river of life—its waters are the waters of love—it starts from God, and flows down through the forests and banks of existence, and carries man on its bosom. The waters are pure and clear at the source, but they become turbid as they recede. It was very dark and muddy when I started, and I was very weak, but the effort gives me strength, and the waters are getting clearer. I seek the source where all is pure and clear.

A magnificent sail-boat was sailing gracefully past, in which was seated a group of thoughtful voyagers, who heard my speech. They put up every sail with the wind, and the water curled in white foam at its prow as it rushed close by him in passing. One at the helm replied, "True my friend; we also seek the source of this river. God is all love; he is much easier to sail than swim! God gives us the wind; we will use it! We will be there long before you!" He replied, 'Use your strength! You'll find before you get there, that your favored something besides sails and wind!" But they were gone. "Ha! ha!" rang out from a great barge loaded with people, which came floating along with the current, lettered on its floating banners, "Nature is for us!" "We demand Nature to obey the commands of God!" "Love and be happy," etc., etc. "Ha! ha!" they shouted, "see that fool yet aiming against the current, in search of justice and God! Say, fellow, you'll find here that God is everywhere, and that you'll find him just as soon if you drift as if you swim? God made this river to use, its water to drink. Its shades for pleasure, its breezes to fan us when we will—we are using it. Here's to your health, old chap, [illegible]!" They, too, were gone. [illegible] sounding [illegible] loaded from bold to burlesque. All ages, faces and sexes, [illegible] sounding [illegible] people singing, [illegible] rushing and water swirling [illegible] to the poor swimmer as he [illegible] made me wish that he, too, [illegible] all things for me! I [illegible] past up the stream. "Behold the gates of glory! Glory to [illegible], Liebig, and all the grand [illegible] who, riding in their giant [illegible] bed nature of her garments or [illegible] hands on God himself, and made [illegible]! Poor ignorant swimmer, how we pity [illegible], too, were gone. I looked for the swimmer. He was buffeting the waves which science rolled upon him, and grasped for fresh air amid the thick smoke and sulphurous swell of her steamers, and then was lost to sight. I looked for which I sat and moved. But I was not satisfied, and when the morrow had come and gone and the shadows grew long on the earth, I turned to the shadow and said, "show me more!" Immediately I was seated on the bank of that same stream. The waters were clear now, but the river not so broad. The landscape was mountainous, and far up the stream rose a vast range of mountains, whose tops were covered with clouds which shone like burnished gold in the setting sun. Down the precipitous sides of the mountain rolled the waters of the river, falling in one unbroken sheet even from the clouds. Eye could not see the top of this stupendous waterfall. The foot of the fall was hid from view by a dense cloud of spray, crowned with innumerable rainbows, ever changing and intermingling in most beautiful tints. Above the roar of the waters was deafening, and it seemed to me as if the whole mountain range rocked and shook, opening vast caverns, out of which belched terrific thunders and lightning torrents.
